Black or Euxine (ak'da) Sea (anc. Pon-tus-Euxinus Turk. Kara Denizi, hi'dra deniz) a great inland sea between Europe and Asia, between lat. 40° 40' and 46° 45' N and lon. 27° 50' and 41° 50' E. Extreme length about 715 miles; greatest breadth 380 miles. Area, approximately 170,000 sq. m. Its drainage area has been estimated to be about 950,000 sq. m. It is surrounded by Russia, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Asiatic and European Turkey, and communicates by the Strait of Yenikale with the Sea of Anzov on the N., and by the Bosphorus with the Sea of Marmara on the SW. Its farther communication is with the Mediterranean, westward through the Sea of Marmara and the Dardanelles. The shores of the Euxine are bold and high on the N.E., E. and S.W., but flat on the N. and W. Its depth is prodigious, being at its maximum 7360 feet, and with a close approximation to this over a large part of its central area. The deeper waters are seemingly immobile, and perhaps even stagnant, rendering them unfit for animal life. Only the upper zone of about 150 fathoms appears to have a vertical circulation. There is a constant surface-flow out through the Bosphorus, which is compensated for by a deeper inwardly setting stream. The water has on the average only one-half the salinity of the ocean, the density ranging from 1.012 to 1.017—a condition due to the vast quantity of fresh water that is thrown into the basin by the large infowing streams. The sea has numerous ports, but the only gulf of importance is that of Kerkinit between the Crimea and the mainland of Russia. There are several islands near the mouth of the Danube, but few elsewhere. The chief affluents are the Danube, Dniester, Bug, Dnieper, the Don (by the Sea of Anzov and the Strait of Yenikale), and the Kuban in Europe, and the Kizil-Irmak and Sakarya in Asia. The Black Sea has no perceptible tide. It is liable to frequent storms, such as are generally met with in great lakes and enclosed seas, but its navigation is so far from being dangerous, as was formerly represented, that probably no sea of equal extent is more safe. It is generally almost entirely free of ice. The waters formerly stood at a considerably higher level than they do to-day but recent explorations have failed to establish any relation existing between this high level and the elevated beach-lines of the Aralo-Caspian basin. The basin of the Black Sea, like that of the Mediterranean, appears to have been brought about through comparatively recent subsidence or crustal breakage.

Bogotá, bō-gō-tā, formerly Santa Fé de Bogotá, also th. fā dā-bō-gō-tā, a city the capital of the republic of Colombia and of the department of Cundinamarca, and the see of an archbishop, situated on the San Francisco River, on an elevated plain, 8530 feet above the sea. It lies at the foot of the Suma-Pas Mountains, with a delightful climate, resembling a perpetual autumn. The mean yearly temperature is 58° with a rainfall of 43.5 inches. Lat. 6° 35' N.; lon 74° 13' W. The streets are narrow, but regular crossing one another at right angles. The principal street, Calle de la República, is very handsome, terminating at one end in a square (Paseo de la Constitución) formed by the palace of the president, the cathedral, the onion-house, etc. Bogotá being subject to earthquakes (in main part destroyed by the earthquake of Nov. 16, 1827) the houses are low and strongly built of sun-dried brick. The religious structures of the city are disproportionately numerous. Bogotá, a centre of Spanish culture for a long period, contains a university, the Colegio Nacional de San Bartolomé, various other colleges, a military academy, a national library (with about 50,000 volumes), observatory, botanical garden, natural history museum, etc. It has manufactures of soap, cloth, cordage, porcelain, glass, etc. The environs of Bogotá are highly interesting. The Rio Yanacá, which traverses the city, joins the Rio Bogotá (or Fúenza) in the centre of the plain and the conjoined waters descend in a SW direction through a long and narrow ravine, and are precipitated at Tequendama where they are contracted to 36 feet in width, in a magnificent fall nearly 500 feet high. About 20 miles from the falls is the natural bridge of Inconso or Pandi formed by two rocks that unite the opposite sides of a deep mountain-ditch, 700 feet above a small torrent. The plain or Caucho contains coal fields, and towards the N border the rich salt-mines of Zipaquirá. Bogotá is the commercialemporium for the inland territory and is connected by rail and highway with Honda, La Dorada, and Jirardot on the Magdalena River. Bohemia, bo-bee-me-g (Ger. Böhmen bö-men Uo-bem Ceekey) a province and nominal kingdom of Austria-Hungary, Cisleithanian division between lat. 48° 37' and 61° 3' N. and lon. 12° 7' and 16° 46' E. bounded NW by the kingdom of Saxony NE by the Prussian province of Silesia, SE. by Moravia and Lower Austria, S. by Upper Austria, and SW by Bavaria. Length from E. to W. 210 miles breadth from N. to S. 170 miles. Area, 20,000 sq. m. Pop. in 1900 (Dec. 31) 5,718,790. The territory consists of a series of upland valleys and basins, which are surrounded on all sides by mountains and belong almost exclusively to the basin of the Elbe, by which stream the country is drained through a single defile on the Saxon frontier. Several chains of lofty mountains constitute the natural boundaries of the Bohemian basin. On the NE it is separated from Silesia by the Riesengebirge (Giant Mountains) the principal branch of the Sudeck system of which the highest peak is the Schneekoppe (snow top) 5264 feet and by the Adlergebirge (Eagle Mountains) the Rabe Mts., 3650 feet. N. and NW it is separated from Saxony by the Erzgebirge (Ore Mountains), which are parted NE from the Riesengebirge by the defile through which the Elbe leaves Bohemia. W. and SW it is separated from Bavaria and Upper Austria by the Böhmerwald (Bohemian Forest), which at its NW extremity is separated from the Erzgebirge by the depression through which the Eger flows. On the SE the Bohemian Moravian plateau, uniting at its SW extremity with the Böhmerwald and at its NE with the Adlergebirge, completes the circle of mountains by which Bohemia is enclosed. Several offsets from these chains of inferior height, intersect the kingdom. The principal affluent of the Elbe in Bohemia is the Moldau.

Bohemia has no large lakes, but there are innumerable ponds. The region is famous for its mineral springs, the best-known of which are the saline chalybeate springs of Franzensbad, Marienbad and Glatzschel; the warm alkaline apocrite springs of Karlsbad and Teplitz; the bitter cathartic waters of Badlitz, Badschütz, and Püllna; and the sulphurous springs of Teplitz. Bohemia is rich in minerals which include silver from lead, copper, tin and molybdenum, and other metals, as well as sulphur, alum, and graphite. It is above all a great coal region, its coal-fields being the most productive in Austria-Hungary. Precious and ornamental stones and porcelain clays are obtained in many parts. The Bohemian region is largely constructed of acidic and ancient Paleozoic rocks, but there are also marine deposits of Triassic and Cretaceous age and vast intrusions and outflows of volcanic material.

The climate is in general healthy. The mean annual temperature, exclusive of the mountainous districts, ranges between 45° and 50°. In the Böhmerwald the snow is often found 12 feet deep and lies till the middle of April. Except in the lofty mountain-ranges, the soil of Bohemia is generally fertile, more especially in the N. and NE. The principal crops raised are rye, barley, wheat, oats, potatoes, beets, flax, hops, rape-seed, and poppy-seed. Fruit is abundant, especially apples and plums. The forests cover nearly 30 per cent. of the surface of the country and abound in game. Large quantities of a superior breed of carp are exported from Bohemia to North Germany. Bohemia is the great manufacturing region of Austria-Hungary. The manufactures include textiles, beet-sugar, beer, spirits, glassware and porcelain, metal wares, machinery, chemicals, paper, wooden wares, buttons, leather, clothing, lace, embroidery, and chocolate. Glass has been a staple article of Bohemian manufacture since the thirteenth century and the art of glass-grinding has scarcely been equalled in any other country.

Three-fifths of the people are Czechs (Bohemians) a Slavic race, with a language of their own, an old and well-developed literature, and strong national feelings. Nearly all the remainder are Germans who as a whole represent the more cultured and intelligent element, the bulk of the Czechs being peasants and dwellers in the small towns and villages. A bitter struggle for ascendancy is being waged by the two nationalities. The Czechs regard the country as their national domain, it having been originally a Slavic kingdom and demand the restoration of the so-called realm of St. Wenceslas (including the adjoining Moravia). They insist on the right of Bohemia to enjoy an autonomous position within the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy analogous to that held by Hungary. The population of Bohemia is nearly all Roman Catholic. There are about 100,000 Jews.

Bohemia possesses one of the largest institutions of learning in Europe, the University of Prague, founded in 1348. It existed until 1882 as a German university but in that year the Czech University of Prague was installed by the side of the original one.

Bohemia derives its name from its early inhabitants, the Boii, a Celtic people, who were expelled soon after the beginning of the Christian era by the Marcomanni. About the middle of the sixth century a numerous army of Czechs entered the country and subdued it. Bohemia, under its dukes, and later its kings, was included in the Holy Roman Empire of the Germans. The immigration of Germans in the Middle Ages greatly improved the character of the country which in the fourteenth century under the Luxemburg dynasty was one of the most flourishing kingdoms in Europe. In the fifteenth century the Hussite Wars devastated the country. Since 1526 Bohemia has been ruled by the House of Austria. The encroachments of the Austrian monarchs on the religious liberties of the Protestants led in 1618 to an outbreak, which was the beginning of the Thirty Years' War. The overthrow of the Bohemian Protestants in the battle of the White Mountain (Prague), in 1620 was followed by the forfeiture of their liberties and the complete subjugation of the country to the Catholic Church. The revival of the national spirit among the Czechs in the nineteenth century has culminated in a revolutionary agitation which is a menace to the permanency of the Austro-Hungarian realm.

Bolivia (Sp pron bo-lé-va) officially, República Boliviana, a South American republic, is bounded on the N and E. by Brazil, on the S. by Paraguay and the Argentine Republic, and on the W. by Chile and Peru. The Amazon, Guaporé, and Paraguay Rivers form the greater part of the eastern boundary with Brazil. The country is mostly included between lat. 7° S (the Yagui-rona) and 25° S. It is divided into the eight departments of Beni (with Acre), Chuquisaca, Cochabamba, La Paz or La Paz de Ayacucho, Oruro, Potosí, Santa Cruz, and Tarija, and the National Territory (of colonization). The total area is approximately 530,000 sq. m., but much of the boundary with Peru and Chile is still in dispute. The population is variously estimated at from 1,250,000 to upward of 2,000,000, of whom it is generally supposed 250,000-300,000 are wild Indians.

Surface of the Country.—The greater part of the west- and south-central portions of Bolivia is mountainous, and is comprised within the great Andean system, containing many of the loftiest summits of the Western Hemisphere. The main line of heights is compassed in the different ramifications of the Eastern Cordillera, or Cordillera Real between which and the Western Cordillera is included part of the great plateau and interior basin, the Altiplano (Central, about 500 miles in length and with an altitude of 12,000-13,000 feet, the N. half of which is occupied by Lake Titicaca and the S. parts by Lake Ullagaya and other salt-lake bodies of water. These seemingly at one time constituted a united vast internal sea, the outlet of which was through the Beni to the Amazon. The Peruvian boundary is generally assumed to pass through the centre of Lake Titicaca. (See TITICACA.) The loftiest mountain-summits are the non-volcanic Illimpu or Sorata (with the Anconama and Illimpu summits, 21,490 and 21,775 ft. respectively) and Illimani, 21,190 ft. both in the department of La Paz. Huina Potosí, located between these two giants has an elevation of 20,260 ft. Volcanic mountains are numerous, and rise to nearly the loftiest positions of the land (Sajama, upward of 21,000 ft. Licancabur, on the SW boundary with Chile, about 19,500 ft.). Northward and eastward of the mountains Bolivia falls off in vast undulating plains (Llanos Pampas) to the valleys of the Amazon basin and the Gran Chaco of Paraguay.

Since the readjustment of the boundary with Chile following upon the war of 1879-81 when the country lost its littoral, Bolivia has no coast-line. Much the greater part of the country is drained by tributaries of the Madeira, one of the chief affluents of the Amazon. Such streams as the Madre de Dios, Beni, Mamoré and Guaporé or Itenez. In the S and SE the country is drained by the Pilcomayo and Paraguay and their branches, into the basin of the La Plata.

Climate and Product.—Bolivia lies in the torrid zone, but has a great variety of climate, depending on the elevation of the land. The mountains are covered with perpetual snow and in the highest table-lands there is frost every night of the year but the air is dry and pure. The higher cold and treeless tracts those above 11,000 ft. are designated Punas. At Potosí which has an elevation of about 13,000 ft., the nights are always piercingly cold, but the rays of the sun are hot and powerful between 2 and 5 P. M. La Paz, at an elevation of 12,000 ft. has a mean annual temperature of about 50°. Between the altitudes of 9500 and 11,000 ft. the climate is temperate, and wheat and maize are cultivated while in the tracts of the Yungas, which descend to about 3500 ft. the climate is such as to permit of the successful cultivation of both tropical and temperate fruits. This is the zone of the great cinchona forests, whose inconstant development is one of the marked features of the fore of the eastern Andes. Perpetual summer reigns in the lowest region called Yungas comprising all below 5000 ft. which produces all tropical fruits and vegetation. The northern plains have a hot and humid climate, and are covered with dense forests. Among the indigenous plants are the palm, manihot, cacao, bean, corn, the maté or Paraguay tea, and the coca. Bolivia also produces balsam, bananas, caoutchouc or rubber, vanilla, opal, coffee, cotton, sugar, potatoes, corn, tobacco, the shirumaya, farina, and samapilla. The Bolivians draw large quantities of the coca-leaf which is a powerful stimulant.

The animal life of Bolivia is very varied, and comprises forms that are more distinctively tropical in habit (jaguar, armadillo, tapir, numerous monkeys, peccary) and others that belong to the higher mountain-tracts (llama, alpaca, guanaco, vicuña, vizcachas). The puna extends its range into this region both in its warmer and colder parts. Among the birds are the condor, various species of parrot, and numerous humming-birds, a number of which appear to be sharply localized in their habitats. The alpaca and llama are domesticated, and exist in large numbers on the high-glaciers. Multitudes of cattle roam in a semi-wild condition over the grassy plains or campos.

Minerals.—This republic is noted for the variety and richness of its mineral resources, having numerous mines of gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, mercury, and iron. Coal is found in the departments of Beni and Chuquisaca. The silver-mines of Potosí and Oruro have long been celebrated, and are among the richest in the world. Silver was first discovered at Potosí in 1545 and the yield up to this time from these famous mines exceeds $3,000,000,000. The production of tin follows immediately after that of silver, the chief mining centre being the district of Huancuni. Gold is found in the Andes and in several departments, the most important locations being in the departments of La Paz and Santa Cruz. The gold-mining has been extensively developed, especially in the districts of Coroico and Chacabilla. Diamonds, opals, emeralds, and topazes are also found. The development of the mineral resources of Bolivia has been hindered by the distance of the mines from navigable water and the expense of transporting the ore or metal to the coast but since the advent of railways and the discovery of coal a revival in mining enterprise has been noticeable. The alluvial product in 1898 was placed at 11,155,190 Troy ounces.

Commerce, etc.—The republic of Bolivia is not favorably situated for commerce, possessing no seaboard while its great rivers are for the most part rendered unnavigable by numerous rapids. There are few good roads in the country. Bolivia has in operation several short railways, and one of the main outlets is the Peruvian railroad from Lake Titicaca to the seaport of Mollendo. The total railroad mileage of the republic was, in 1902, 625. The chief articles of export, besides the metals, are alpaca wool, chinchilla fur, leather, hides, rubber, cacao, cinchona-bark, coffee, coca, vanilla, and opal.

Race, Government, etc.—The population is composed of Indians, mixed race, called mestizo, zambo, and mulattoes, who have much Spanish blood mixed with Indian or negro, and of whites mainly of Spanish origin. Some of the Indians are civilized, especially the Aymara and Quichua tribes who are remnants of the great Inca nation and inhabit the highlands of western Bolivia. The eastern plains are inhabited by tribes of wild Indians who have no affinity with the Aymara and Quichua. The predominant religion of Bolivia is Roman Catholic, and the prevailing language is Spanish.

The republic was founded in 1825, and named in honor of Simón Bolívar, the Liberator. The territory included in the new state was previously called Upper Peru. The executive government consists of a president (elected for a term of four years) two vice-presidents, a ministry of five members and three secretaries of state. The legislative functions are exercised by two chambers—the senate and the chamber of deputies. Bolivia has been disturbed by frequent revolutions and civil wars. Capital, La Paz; formerly, Sucre (Chuquisaca).

Bombay, bōm'bā (Hindu Bambai), a seaport of British India, capital of the presidency of Bombay on the island of Bombay (now artificially converted into a peninsula, all of which is included in the municipal limits). Lat. of the observatory 18° 53' 45" N., lon 72° 48' 55" E. Since the opening of its extensive railway communications, the development of cotton-culture in India, and the construction of the Suez Canal Bombay has wonderfully increased in wealth and importance. It is well built, with spacious and handsome streets, fine public and mercantile buildings, tramway lines, and all the sanitary improvements of a great modern city. Many of the Europeans have their residences on Malabar Hill and at Breach Candy, on the side of the island facing the sea. The projecting ridge of Malabar Hill and a long, narrow peninsula projection, terminating in Kalahe Island, form what is known as the Back Bay on the S side of Bombay Island. At the head of the latter peninsula is the quarter of the city called the Castle, containing the principal government buildings, the town-hall (having a library of 100,000 volumes), the university library, and spacious public squares, adorned with statues. On the W side of the Castle extends the broad Esplanade, with a statue of Queen Victoria. N of the Castle stretches the native quarter called the Black Town and further north are the Victoria Gardens, with a museum and botanical and zoological gardens. The suburban houses are interspersed with groves of acacia-trees, and often overshadowed by mangoes, palms, and tamarinds. Among the public institutions are the Victoria and Albert Museum and the observatory. The University of Bombay is not a teaching body but merely grants degrees. There are large cotton-mills, tanneries, dye-works, and shops for metal-work as well as native distilleries and manufacturers of articles of war. Bombay now surpasses Calcutta in the volume of its commerce. The chief exports are cotton grain, and opium. Many of the leading merchants are Parsees. In point of health and comfort few places in India excel Bombay. The harbor of Bombay is unequalled for safety in all India. It affords good anchorage for ships of the largest burden on its excellent building and other docks for ships of the first class. The Victoria railway station, completed in 1857 is one of the most magnificent structures of its kind in the world. Some of the old forts defending the harbor of Bombay still remain. Pop. in 1881 773,106. In 1891, 884,470; in 1901, 778,006. More than three-fifths of the inhabitants are Hindus and nearly one-fifth Mohammedans. There are about 50,000 Parsees and about an equal number of Christians of whom only a third are British-born. The Jains number about 23,000 and the Jews about 5000.

BOMBAY ISLAND, on which the city is situated, is one of a cluster of islands, and the largest of all except Salsette, with which it is connected by a mound, an arched stone bridge, and railway embankments. It is 11 miles long from N to S. and 5 miles broad, formed by two ranges of rock of unequal length, running parallel to each other on opposite sides of the island. The interior was formerly liable to be overflowed by the sea, which is now prevented by substantial works and embankments. The lower parts are still covered with water during the rainy monsoon. The island is next to Madras, the oldest of the British possessions in the East. It passed into the possession of Portugal early in the sixteenth century, and was given to

Bombay, a presidency of British India, bounded W by the Arabian Sea, and enclosed elsewhere by Beluchistan, the Punjab Rajputana, Indore, the Central Provinces, Barar, the Nizam's dominions, Madras, and Mysore. The well-marked districts called the Dekkan, Konkan, Gujerat, and Sind are among the natural divisions of the country. The principal rivers are the Indus, the Nerbudda, and the Tapti. The Run of Cutch a singular arm of the sea, periodically converted into a marshy desert-tract, is a most remarkable natural feature. Rice, several sorts of millet, wheat, oil-seeds, cotton and other fibres, teak, opium sugar and tea are among the staple products. Manufacturing is quite largely carried on by the natives, and has of late been undertaken on an important scale, European machinery and capital being employed. Cotton-spinning is the chief industry about two-thirds of the Indian spindles belonging to the presidency of Bombay. Capital Bombay with the seat of government held at Poona during the months of July-November. The chief hill-station is Mahabaleshwar. The presidency of Bombay includes Aden, on the coast of Arabia. Borneo, bor-ne-o (native, Pulo Kalimantan), the fifth largest island in the world is in the Malay Archipelago, lat. 7° S N-4 10 S lon 108° 50'-119° 20' E. It lies about half in the northern and half in the southern hemisphere, and is of roughly hexagonal outline, with an area of approximately 290 000 sq. m. The coast-line is broken by comparatively few bays and inlets. Much of the interior is little known. The centre seems to be a plateau or nuclear mountain mass, from which diverge several mountain-chains of which the principal one runs from SW to NE, along the longest axis of the island. Between the mountain ranges are alluvial plains which towards the ocean are often swampy, and these plains and swamps are at many points rapidly encroaching upon the shallow seas. Their low position subjects them to overflows, the oceanic waters frequently extending far into the interior. A subsidence of 500 feet would carry the ocean nearly to the centre of the island. The highest known mountain-summit is Kinabalu, in British North Borneo, with an elevation of 13,696 feet, at one time erroneously supposed to be a volcano. Mount Tubang situated towards the centre of the island, has been thought to be snow-capped. Borneo possesses a number of large rivers the entrances to most of them unfortunately blocked by bars and morasses growth; beyond the bars they are navigable for long distances, and frequently expand into lake-like surfaces with deep water.

The more important streams are the Rajang, Kapuas Barito (nearly 500 miles in length), Kating, and Balangan. Borneo is for the most part a seething jungle, densely clad with rich and varied vegetation. The heat is not generally oppressive, but as a whole the island has a bad reputation in respect to health especially in the low-lying plains and malarious country of the seaboard. The maximum temperature along the coast ranges from about 82° to 93° or 95° (in August). The rainfall is often very violent, as much as 9 inches having been registered in a single day. At Sandakan the mean annual rainfall is about 124 inches. The mineral wealth of Borneo is great. Considerable gold is obtained here also some coal and great quantities of antimony. Diamonds are occasionally found, and mercury, salt, petroleum, tin, copper and iron are known to exist. The island in its present form is geologically of comparatively recent date, the Tertiary strata, which include all the deposits of coal being widely distributed. There are no active volcanoes, but a few mostly insignificant, extinct ones have lately been discovered. Among the wild animals are the panther bear orang-outang and other apes, rhinoceros, elephant, deer of several kinds tapir wild swine, wild oxen civets, and many others. Insects and reptiles are exceedingly abundant.

Of the native races of men, the Dyaks are the most remarkable and least civilized, but the Malays have long been the dominant race on the coast. The seaports are largely peopled by Chinese and their half-breed descendants. The vegetable products of the island include excellent timber of many kinds, some cotton, palm-fibre, sago, camphor, gutta-percha, betel, nutmeg, cloves, cinnamon, gambier, rattans and rice and nearly all the tropical fruits here attain the highest perfection. The greater portion of the island, containing what may be termed the southern, central, and eastern sections, is a Dutch possession being governed directly by Dutch officers or by delegated native chiefs and sultans. This part of the territory is in itself divided into two provinces West Borneo and South and East Borneo. The remainder of the island is constituted by the sultanates or states of Sarawak, Brunei, and British North Borneo (with the island of Labuan and the interior district, since 1899 of Tambunan) all under the protection of Great Britain, and the last named (the so-called independent state of North Borneo) being administered directly by the British North Borneo Company. The sultan of Sulu also exercises some jurisdiction over the northern coast. The total population of the island is estimated at 1,750,000 of which nearly 1,200,000 fall to Dutch Borneo (with an area of 211,500 sq. m.) (See BRUNY, BRUNY, NORTH BORNEO, and SARAWAK). The prevailing religion of Borneo is Mohammedanism, except among the Dyaks, who are idolaters. The old Dyak custom of collecting human heads in dying out and the people, though rude and ignorant, are truthful, moral, and naturally intelligent.

Bornholm, born holm (L. Boringsen), an island of Denmark in the Baltic Sea, forming part of the staff of Zealand, 25 miles S of the southernmost point of Sweden. Its most northern point is Cape Himmeren on which is a light-house in lat 55° 17' 4" N lon 14° 44' 26" E. It is about 23 miles long by 16 broad, area, about 210 sq. m. In general the coast is high presenting perpendicular cliffs, close to which is deep water. Where cliffs do not prevail, reef and sand-banks stretch out to sea, rendering approach dangerous. The highest elevation is 530 feet. The best harbor is at Rønne, the capital on the SW side. Excepting on elevated heath-tract near the centre, the land is generally fertile. The island has long been famous for its rock-crystals. Agriculture, cattle-rearing, fishing and seafaring afford the chief support of the inhabitants, who own about 200 vessels. Pop. in 1901 40,877.

Bornio, bon no, a village of Italy 22 miles NE of Bergamo, on the Oglio.

Lake Chad and Baghirmi, S. Mandara, and W. Sokoto. Lake Chad appears to receive all the waters of Bornu. The chief rivers are the Shari from the mountains of Mandara, and the Komadugu from those of Houma. The climate is excessively hot. The dry season is from April to October and the rainy season during the remainder of the year. The whole country is flat, and by far the greater part is covered with underwood, coarse grass, and creeping and climbing plants, while around Lake Chad and for a considerable distance west and south it is alluvial and marshy. The chief productions are millet, barley, beans, ground nuts, maize, cotton and indigo. The principal wealth of the inhabitants is in slaves and cattle, and the horses of Bornu are greatly prized. The exports are of little importance at present, the trade in gold-dust, civet, and slaves having materially declined of late. The mass of the people are negroes, who profess fetishism and are divided into tribes speaking different idioms. The dominant race is that of the Kanuri or Kanowri, a people of mixed negro and Tibbet stock, tillers of the soil with industrial habits and skilled in many of the mechanical arts. They have a developed administrative organization and a fairly advanced military system. Pop. estimated at 5,000,000. Principal towns: Kuks (the former capital on the W side of Lake Chad) Ngurna Dikou (capital since 1894) Old and New Borni, Makhama, and Logona. Since Jan 1900 the greater portion of Bornu has formed part of British Nigeria.

Bos'nia (Serb and Turk. Bosna) a country which, together with the adjoining Herzegovina (on the S.) forms an appendage of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and is now virtually a part of it, though nominally included in the Turkish Empire. Bosnia and Herzegovina were handed over by the Great Powers at the close of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 to Austria-Hungary to be held and occupied for an indefinite period. Bosnia, in the broader sense (inclusive of Herzegovina) has an area of 19 700 sq. m. It is bounded on the N. by Croatia-Slavonia, most of the boundary on this side being formed by the Save, on the E. by Servia, from which it is so great part separated by the Drina, on the SE by Nevrinac and Montenegro and on the SW and W by Dalmatia and Croatia. It is separated from the last two regions by the Dinaric Alps, and is traversed by several ranges whose general direction approximately is that of the Dnieper chain. These ranges which bear the general name of Planina, rise to elevations of between 5000 and 7500 feet. They enclose a number of elevated valleys and plateaus, but beyond these the level tracts are mainly confined to narrow strips along the Save and its tributaries. The region is well watered. Several considerable rivers flow northward to join the Save, including the Una, Vrbas, Bosna, and Drina. The Adriatic receives the Neretva, the principal river of Herzegovina. Half of the surface is covered with fine forests, which abound in all kinds of game although the number of fur-bearing animals has greatly diminished. Vast quantities of fruit are raised the plums enjoying a special reputation. There are excellent pastures and many fertile valleys, but the area under cultivation is not very great. Large numbers of cattle sheep goats, and swine are reared. Good wine is produced and the tobacco of Herzegovina is of fine quality. Bosnia possesses large beds of coal, besides which the mineral products comprise iron silver quicksilver etc. There are numerous mineral springs. The climate is on the whole temperate and healthy although the cold is often severe in the elevated regions while in parts of Herzegovina the mercury sometimes rises to above 100°. The population of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1895 was 1 591 036 of whom all but about one-seventh were in Bosnia proper. The great bulk of the inhabitants Bosnians and Herzegovinians, belong to the Serb stock and their speech differs but slightly from the language spoken in Servia. About 43 per cent. of the people belong to the Oriental Greek Church and about half as many are Bosnian Catholics while one-third of the population are Mussulmans. There are about 8000 Jews. The Gypsies in Bosnia number about 13,000. The Mohammedans, to which class belong the wealthier townspeople and the upper ranks of the rural landholders, are mainly descendants of Slavs, long ago converted to Islam. They call themselves Turks. The inhabitants of Bosnia still cling to a great extent to Oriental dress. The manufactures, which are mainly confined to textiles leather articles and metallic wares, produced on a small scale, have begun to expand since the Austro-Hungarian occupation. The Austro-Hungarian government has achieved great results in the way of furthering the economic, as well as the intellectual condition of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which present a strange blending of Oriental character with modern progressive spirit. There are now several hundred miles of railway in the country. The exports include grain live-stock, and animal products, staves (of which immense quantities are made) coal mineral waters and grapes (to the extent of about 25,000,000 pounds annually). The government of Bosnia and Herzegovina is administered by Cisleithan Austria and Hungary conjointly. The chief towns are Sarajevo (the former Bosna-Sera), the capital and the only town of over 20 000 inhabitants, Mostar (in Herzegovina) Banjaluka, Dobrinja, Bieline, and Travnik.

Bosnia, which for a brief period at the close of the fourteenth century figured as a Slavic kingdom was permanently conquered by the Turks in 1463. There were bloody massacres in 1450-51 and 1875-76. The Mohammedans offered a fierce resistance to the Austro-Hungarian occupation in 1878. The speedy extension of the Austro-Hungarian customs sphere so as to include Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the introduction of universal military service in the region, signified the permanent enrolment of the inhabitants among the subjects of the Hapsburgs.

Bosporus, less correctly written Bosphorus (Turk. Bosphor, bo gls. Gr. Bosphoros, —a. s. 'ox ford, from the myth which represented it as changed into a cow, as swimming over the strait, L. Bosporus Thracicus), called also the Strait of Constantinople, a narrow passage which connects the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora and separates Europe from Asia. It is about 15 miles long, and varies in width from less than half a mile to 1½ miles. The narrowest point is 1300 feet wide. A surface-current sets constantly through it from the Black Sea, running with great violence and rapidly when the wind is from the NE but hardly perceptible when it blows from the opposite quarter, namely the SW., and there is a pretty constant reverse-current under this outward flow maximum depth 303 feet. The scenery along the banks of the channel is extremely beautiful, with magnificent summer residences, most of them on the Asiatic side, handsome houses and noble gardens being thickly distributed over the vicinity of the strait on both sides. At the narrowest part of the channel about 5 miles from its southern entrance, stand the two castles or forts called respectively Rumeli Hisar and Anadol Hisar—the former on the western or European side, and the latter on the eastern or Asiatic side. Both are now well provided with modern ordnance. The Bosporus was in ancient times remarkable for its tannery fishery, which is still a source of profit. Constantinople stands on its W side at its outlet, and partly on the Sea of Marmora, opposite Bombard. The Bosporus of Constantinople is called the Thracian Bosporus, to distinguish it from the Chimerian Bosporus, now called the Strait of Yenisah, which gave its name to the ancient Greek kingdom of Bosporus, embracing the Crimea and adjoining regions.

Boston (contracted from Botolphstoun) a municipal and parliamentary borough of England, co. of Lincoln, situated in a rich agricultural district on the estuary of the Witham, 5 miles from the North Sea and 28 miles SE. of Lincoln. The town is divided into two parts by the Witham. Its medieval parish church (church of St. Botolph) injured by fire in 1590) is the largest without steeple in the kingdom: length, 301 feet; breadth, 90 feet. The tower 280 feet in height, resembles that of Antwerp cathedral, and forms a landmark visible 40 miles distant. Boston has manufactures of sailcloth, canvas, and seeking, iron-foundries, and shipyards. In the latter part of the Middle Ages it was one of the chief seaports of England. The port has recently been greatly improved, so that large sea-going vessels can unload in the town, whence the navigation is continued to Lincoln by small steamers and barges. Boston returns 1 member to the House of Commons. Pop. in 1901, 11,687.

Boston, a city of the United States, capital of Massachusetts and of Suffolk co. on a bay called Boston Harbor which forms the inner right of Massachusetts Bay at the mouth of the Charles and Mystic rivers. Lat. 42° 21' 30" N., lon. 71° 5' 30" W. The original town stood upon a peninsula called by the Indians Shawmut, and by the settlers Tremont or Trimontaine, from the three summits of a conical hill, which, though now much reduced, is still prominent and known as Boston Hill. The city now includes the island of East Boston (Noddie's Island) and the peninsular suburbs of South Boston and Charlestown, besides the former towns of Dorchester, Roxbury (or Boston Highlands), West Roxbury and Brighton, with their minor villages of Allston, Jamaica Plain, Neponset, Mattapan, etc. The cities of Quincy, Newton, Cambridge, Somerville, and Chelsea are near suburbs, and there are many large towns (such as Milton, Dedham, Brookline, Watertown, and Everett) in close proximity. Great areas adjoining the original Shawmut have been reclaimed from the harbor and its islands, so that what was originally the neck of the peninsula is now the widest part of it. These parts are covered with substantial and costly buildings. The city is the terminus of many railroads, of which the principal are the New York, New Haven and Hartford, the Boston and Maine, the Boston and Albany, the Fitchburg and the Boston, Beverly Beach and Lynn Rrs. Numerous bridges over navigable waters, besides the railway bridges, connect the city and suburbs, while East Boston is reached by ferry. Boston is one of the best-built cities in the United States, and has strongly felt the spirit of architectural progress. The streets in the older portion once singularly irregular in their course, have been somewhat straightened, but are still far from the uniform regularity in many younger towns.

Among the public buildings and institutions are the State House (greatly enlarged in 1889-90) with its conspicuous gilded dome, fronting on the Common (a small but well-kept park of 48 acres, adjacent to which is the Public Garden, reclaimed from the sea and covering 24 acres) the Old State House (built in 1740), Christ Church (1723); Faneuil Hall, the 'cradle of American liberty' (1743), rebuilt after a fire in 1781; King's Chapel (1754) the custom-house, Music Hall, the new Symphony Hall the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston Athenaeum (containing the rooms of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences), Lowell Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology (one of the best schools of industrial science in the United States), Government Building, Museum of Natural History, Museum of Fine Arts, Horticultural Hall the buildings of the Massachusetts Historical Society and of the Harvard Medical School (a department of Harvard University), Exchange, and the Public Library an imposing and sumptuously decorated structure, which was erected in 1855-56 at a cost of nearly $2,500,000. It contains upward of 700,000 volumes and is the largest free library in the world. Boston stands well in the front of cities with regard to charitable institutions, there being nearly 1000 organizations devoted to charity, relief, beneficence, or mutual aid. Of these the Perkins Institute for the Blind the Horace Mann School for Deaf Mutes, and the Massachusetts General Hospital have a world-wide reputation. Among the notable churches of the city are Trinity Church (which was fully completed in 1893, and is regarded as one of the finest buildings in America), the Roman Catholic cathedral, and the New Old South Church in the Italian Gothic style, with a tower 248 feet high, and built in 1874-75. The Old South Meeting-House, built in 1729 on the site of an earlier church, marks the location of some of the most stirring episodes of the early Revolutionary period. A magnificent system of public parks on a vast scale, sweeping around the whole border of the city has recently been inaugurated. Franklin Park, in West Roxbury covers 520 acres. Of the handsome avenues and quarters of the city may be mentioned Commonwealth Avenue, one of the finest residence streets of America, 240 feet in width Beacon Street the strictly aristocratic street of Boston the Back Bay the fashionable west-end, to which the above avenues lead, and the Back Bay Fen. Copley Square, flanked by the Public Library the Museum of Fine Arts, Trinity Church, and the New Old South Church, presents a striking architectural effect. Among the principal business thoroughfares are Washington, Tremont, and State streets. Several of the railroad stations are imposing structures, notably those known as the Providence, the Northern Union, and the Southern Union Stations, the last-named completed in 1898 at a cost of $14,000,000 and ranking as the largest railway station in the world. It is 812 feet in length and 790 feet in width, and gives accommodation to 28 tracks on the main floor besides a 14-track loop for suburban service on the lower floor. An elevated railway operated by electricity extends through Boston from Roxbury to Charlestown. Associated with the railway service of the city is the remarkable engineering work known as the Subway, a subterranean passage-way completed in 1898 and given over to the use of electric cars. The Shaw Monument (erected to the memory of Robert Gould Shaw who organized the first colored regiment in the North in the Civil War) is a masterpiece of sculpture by Saint Gaudens. In Charlestown stands the famous Bunker Hill Monument, a granite shaft 221 feet high, erected in 1835-42 to commemorate the battle of Bunker or Breed's Hill, June 17, 1776.

The public school system of Boston is one of the largest and most elaborate to be found anywhere, and embraces institutions of every grade. Special attention is given to art studies in these schools. The higher educational institutions are the Boston University with various additions, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology already referred to. Although located in its principal seat in Cambridge, Harvard University can justly be claimed to be a part of the educational activity of the city and probably no other educational institution of the country has done more to uphold a high standard of scholarship and general efficiency in learning. (See CAUCASIANS.) Boston has long been noted for the interest taken by its citizens in literature, science and art, and in questions of social and humanitarian bearing. No other city of the Union has exerted so marked an influence in shaping the literature of the nation and with no other city are the names of so many men eminent in the arts, letters and sciences associated.

Boston has varied and extensive manufactures, including machinery, furniture, fertilizers, farm implements, general hardware, boots and shoes, type, castings, rubber, chemicals, musical instruments, etc., but it is as a trade and money-center that she won and has maintained her eminence, ranking next to New York as the most important commercial port of the United States. The value of the foreign trade was, in 1900, about $200,000,000 of which the exports amounted to about $125,000,000. The shoe and leather wool, fish, ice, publishing and domestic dry-goods trades and the refining of sugar are leading interests. Boston takes place immediately after London as the leading wool market of the world. The harbor of the city is excellent, and the wharves, warehouses and other shipping facilities are not surpassed. Steamers ply hence to Europe and to the principal ports of the United States, Canada, the West Indies, the Orient, etc. The inner harbor is completely sheltered, not difficult of access, and seldom encumbered with ice. Several large works have been constructed for its defence, Fort Independence, Warren and Winthrop being of ancient importance. More modern defenses have recently been established, and with these have been constructed massive protecting sea-walls on some of the outlying islands. The harbor is about 36 miles long from N to S and 8 miles wide from E to W and covers 75 sq. m. Among its several arms are the South Bay, Dorchester Bay and Back Bay. The last of which is an expansion of the Charles River, the principal stream flowing into the harbor. The Mystic and Neponset Rivers also flow into the harbor. The insular suburb of East Boston has extensive manufacturing, but is especially important for its docks, wharves, and elevators. Charlestown is the seat of a large United States navy yard.

Boston was founded by colonists under John Winthrop, governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1630. It was named after the town of Boston, in England. It early became the seat of a large and profitable commerce, and took an active part in the events which led to the War of Independence. Prominent events in its history have been the expulsion of Governor Andros 1689, the witchcraft troubles, 1692, the great fire of 1876, 1878, and 1711 the Boston massacre, 1770, the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor, 1773 and the consequent passage of the Boston Port Bill by the British parliament, 1774, the battle of Bunker Hill within the present city limits, 1775, the siege of the town by Washington and the evacuation by the British, 1775-76, the granting of the city charter 1822, the absorption of the surrounding towns and cities by annexation in 1868 and later and the great fire of 1872, which covered about 65 acres and destroyed property valued at over $30,000,000. The conflagration led to great changes in the straightening and widening of streets, and the burnt district was rebuilt in greatly improved style.

Few American cities have suburbs with finer natural advantages, and most of the suburban towns are handsomely and substantially built, with pleasant and well-shaded streets. The cemeteries of Mount Auburn and Forest Hills are near the city and are noted for their beauty and extent. The outer harbor is filled with islands, and the coast of the mainland near the city is gently elevated and rocky with many picturesque localities, much resorted to in summer. The most-favored pleasure-resort is probably Nahant, forming the southeastern wall of the harbor. Of the immediate suburban neighbors of the city the most beautiful is Brookline, on the SW.

The population of Boston in 1790 was 18,330. In 1800, 24,937. In 1810, 33,787. In 1820, 45,396. In 1830, 61,393. In 1840, 93,383. In 1850, 130,681. In 1860, 177,840. In 1870, 254,525. In 1880, 342,530 (the gain having been in part due to the annexation of adjacent suburbs). In 1890, 448,477, and in 1900, 550,692.

Brzhanaputra, brz han-pu'tra, formerly written Burrampootor (anc. Dyandanes or Edanes) a great river of India. Its principal head-stream, the Sanpo (Tanpo or Daangbo—holy water)—as known in the eastern part of its course at the Dihong—rises on the Tibetan plateau at an elevation of about 15,000 feet, in about lat. 31° 30' N. lon 82° 5' E. and in near proximity to the head waters of the Ganges India, and Sutlej. It follows a generally eastward course for about 900 miles then turns southward breaking through the Himalayan barrier in a long and deep gorge, and appears on the plains of northern Assam at an elevation of only 450 feet above the sea. In about lat 27° 45' N. lon 85° 30' E. it receives the Dihong and immediately after the Lohit or Brahmaputra, both of which (minor) streams were at one time thought to be the main Brahmaputra. From that point the course of the stream is mainly SW and S. The Brahmaputra finally becomes blended with the Ganges and the Megna in probably the largest de-ta-system of the globe, forming an immense number of navigable channels, and flowing at last into the Bay of Bengal. The main stream has a strong current, but is serviceable for extensive steam navigation. In the rainy season the river overflows its banks, converting the region traversed by it into a vast inland sea. The river is regularly navigated by steamers to Dibrugarh about 800 miles from its mouth, vessels of large burden ascend to Gauhati. The total length of the river is about 1500 miles.

Brasil, brâs'il' (Port. pron brâs'il Fr. Brésil, brâs'el' Ger. Brasilien brâs'el'ien L. Brasilis) a republic of South America, occupying nearly one-half of that continent, principally in the torrid zone, is bounded on the N. by the Guianas and the republics of Venezuela and Colombia, on the NE, E. and SE by the Atlantic Ocean and on the W. SSW. and S by Peru, Bolivia, Paraguay, the Argentina Republic, and Uruguay. It extends from lat. 1° 10' N. to 33° 45' S., and lon. 34° 50' to 74° 30' W. Its greatest length is about 3,600 miles. The coast-line is not deeply indented by bays or inlets, the straits of the Amazon forming its largest recess. Area, officially estimated at 8,218,150 sq m. Capital, Rio de Janeiro.

King of the Land—The surface of Brazil may be properly divided into a vast eastern highland or series of plateaus of from 2,500 to 3,500 feet general elevation with lofty mountain-summits and ridges rising above these, and of a more extensive lowland coincident in the main with the valleys of the Amazon and the Paraguay Paraná system of waters. The western highland is chiefly constructed of Archæan and ancient Paleozoic rocks, and represents a lofty continental area which has been worn low through long-continued denudation. The states of Minas Geraes, Goyas, and Mato Grosso occupy the loftier parts of the highland their great plains being known as Campos Geraes Tubaleros etc. Of the more clearly defined mountain-ranges are those that lie not very far from the western border and run more or less parallel with it. Such are the Serra Geral and Serra do Mar extending between lat. 33 and 30° S. the Serra da Mantiqueira, with the peak of Itatiaia, variously estimated at between 9,000 and 10,340 feet in elevation the loftiest summit of the republic the Serra do Espinhaço, and the Serra dos Aíguas. This magnificent scenery of the Bay of Rio is formed largely by the imposing and serrated summits of the Organ Mountains, whose loftiest elevations probably exceed 7,000 feet. A noteworthy summit in the state of Minas Geraes is Itacolmit about 5,750 feet in height, which gives name to the peculiar flexible sandstone known as Itacolmita.

The great lowlands, which are comprised in principal part in the Amazon basin, and constitute more than one-half of the area of the republic, occupy a general elevation of less than 600 feet above the sea, but are bordered by cliffs and escarpments which rise 500-1,000 feet higher. This vast depression occupies the position of a comparatively recent interior sea, which extended to the foot of the Andes and its exceedingly fertile soil belongs largely to nearly the latest geological period. It is covered by the greatest continuous extent of forest in the world and no region of the earth's surface can compare in the luxuriance of its vegetable growth with the bottom plains or Selvas of Brazil. At times of high water this forest land is not infrequently flooded to a depth of 40-50 feet, forming the so-called várzea (flooded forest).

Rivers—No country exceeds this in the number and magnitude of navigable rivers, which form a complete network and render the most central parts of the republic easily accessible. To Brazil belongs the greater part of the Amazon, which encompasses in volume every other river on the globe. It flows nearly eastward across the great equatorial plain, and it is the only great river whose course is all near the same latitude. It enters Brazil at Tabatinga (more than 2,000 miles from its mouth) and is navigable for large vesonly in all parts of its course below that point. The principal affluents of the Amazon, which all enter it at a very acute angle, are the Javary, Juruá, Purús, Madeira, Tapajós, and Xingú on the S. and the Rio Negro on the N. Several of these streams being of nearly first magnitude, and affording a great extent of navigable waters. The mouths of all these are in Brazil, which also includes the greater part of their courses. The other large rivers are the Tocantins which flows northward, the São Francisco which drains the eastern part, the Paraná, which flows southward, the Paraguay a tributary of the Paraná, the Araguay, the Parahyba, and the Uruguay. These are mostly navigable for steamers. Brazil has no large lakes.

Climate.—This republic is nearly all in the torrid zone. The climate is generally healthy. In the great plain of the Amazon the heat is tempered by immense forests, a large expanse of water and the trade-wind, which almost constantly blows up the river. This equatorial plain enjoys perpetual summer and here the year is divided into only two seasons, the wet and the dry. The rainfall is excessive during the wet season, which begins about Dec. 15 and continues nearly six months. The mean annual temperature on the banks of the Amazon is about 81°. Part which is one degree from the equator enjoys an agreeable climate, the maximum temperature of which is 65° and the minimum about 70° the mean for the year being 78°. In the western portions of the Amazon valley the temperature occasionally rises to 125°. A region of temperate climates is found in the southern highlands, where frosts are not unknown although snow and ice, even on the loftiest summits, are rare and but passing phenomena. Exceptionally severe winter weather, as in 1855, when 30,000 head of cattle are said to have perished in the Lagoa district of Rio Grande do Sul has at times proved most destructive. At Rio de Janeiro the mean annual temperature is about 74° with a maximum of 100° and a minimum of 50°. The prevalent winds of the greater portion of Brazil are the trade-winds, which blow from the east and carry an abundant supply of moisture from the ocean to the interior. The rainfall varies from less than 20 inches on some parts of the coast-border (68 inches at Pará) to between 500 and 600 inches, or perhaps even more, in the deeper portions of the Amazon valley.

Geology and Minerals.—The mountains of Brazil are mostly composed of gneiss and granite. Gneiss is exposed at the extremities of the Madeira, the Tapajós, the Tocantins, and the Xingú and it is probable that this rock underlies nearly all the table-lands and highlands, although covered in great part by deposits of Cretaceous and Tertiary age. The valley of the Amazon is remarkable for the uniform character of its geology presenting few lithological types other than clays and sandstones. In the valley of the upper São Francisco River are limestone caverns containing many bones of extinct animals of the Post-Pliocene period, such as the megatherium, mastodon and glyptodon. Devonian and Carboniferous rocks are found in parts of the country. Among its mineral resources are diamonds, beryls, rubies, topazes, amethysts, garnets, gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, coal, mercury and sulphur. The diamond mines of Brazil are among the most important in the world. The diamond was first discovered in Brazil in 1725, at the site of the city of Diamantina, on the slope of Itambé Mountain, from which location was also obtained the famous Portuguese crown stone known as the Braganza (by some authorities stated to be a topaz). Diamond-mining is also carried on in the state of Bahia. Gold is found in quartz, in drift gravel, and in alluvial sands, the most important seat of gold-mining and the richest mines being in the state of Minas Gerais, near Ouro Preto. The output from this state is about 150,000 ounces a year. Most of the mines of Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo have been abandoned, or are but indifferently worked. Iron abounds in nearly all the states. Rich copper-deposits are found in the states of Goiás, Mato Grosso, and Rio Grande do Sul but little systematic effort has thus far been made to work the ore. Silver is found alloyed with gold at several places. Coal is mined at several points in the S. principally in the state of Rio Grande do Sul and is of the Carboniferous age, and highly bituminous. It is an excellent gas and steam coal.

Vegetation.—The vegetation is extremely luxuriant and is composed of a great multitude of species. The great plain traversed by the Amazon and its tributaries is covered by a dense, primeval, and impenetrable forest, in which gigantic trees are entwined, draped, and festooned by parasitical creepers, climbing plants, and lianas. No region in the world produces such a quantity and variety of useful and ornamental timber. The species of palm are particularly numerous, including the useful cocconut and the Ceara-huba or wax-palm. Among the leguminous trees are the Brazil-wood, a species of Cassipouira, which is used as a red dyestuff, and the Azadirachta indica which affords durable ship-timber. Among the other Brazilian trees are several species of rubber or caoutchouc, the rosewood, mahogany, silk-cotton, monkey or oil-nut, Brazil-nut, etc. The best fruits are the pineapple, mango, alligator pear, guava, papaya, orange and annos or custard apple. The most important plants cultivated for food are coffee, sugar cane, rice, maize, bananas, yams, and manioc or cassava, which yields farina and tapioca. The last is indigenous and is the plant on which the Indians and others largely depend for subsistence. The value of the annual product of coffee is much more than that of any other plant cultivated in Brazil. The production in 1898 was 1,530,000,000 pounds, and the export value in 1899 was about $85,000,000 and in 1902, $98,000,000. The export value of rubber was in 1899 about $5,400,000 and in 1902, $33,000,000. The Hevea caribbea, which yields latex or Paraguay tea, is indigenous in the southern districts. Many valuable medicinal plants are natives of this country. Cotton and tobacco are extensively grown. The annual production of cotton is about 240,000 bales (of 400 pounds each). Among the valued native products are sarsaparilla, copal, copaiba, ipocassia, peroba brava, jabonandi, plantain, guarana, etc. The cultivation of tea is an industry of much promise. The greater portion of the elevated campos is treeless, and in many parts supports grass only. There is much swampland.

Animals.—The number of species of animals is very great. The largest beasts of prey are the jaguar, the puma or cougar, tiger-cat, and ocelot. The forests are tenanted by immense numbers of monkeys whose habits are as heretofore. Several species of deer are found on the open plains. Among the other mammals are the tapir, ant-eater sloth, armadillo, peccary, capybara, etc. and among reptiles the boa-constrictor, anaconda, and alligator. The Brazilian birds are noted for the beauty of their plumage, especially the parrots, toucans, chattering manikins, and humming birds. Of the larger birds of prey are the turkey vulture and the Brazilian harpy eagle. The species of fish are exceedingly abundant in the Amazon and its tributaries, the lower waters of which also abound in large turtles, porpoises, and the manatee. Immense herds of cattle and horses are pastured on the plains of the interior. The cattle are caught with the lasso, and killed for the hides and tallow.

Commerce and Industry.—The industries of Brazil are confined almost exclusively to agriculture, mining, and forest products, manufacturing having thus far been but slightly developed. The chief articles of export are coffee, india-rubber, sugar cane, raw cotton, hides and tobacco. The value of the exports for the year 1902 was about $175,000,000. The value of the imports from the United States in 1903 was nearly $11,000,000 of the exports to the states, $87,000,000. The spinning and weaving of cotton have reached large proportions, especially in the southern districts. There were in the republic in 1902, 63 distinct lines of steam railway which operated 9370 miles of road.

Government, Races, etc.—The population of Brazil consists of white persons of European descent, negroes, Indians, mamelucos (a mixture of Indians with whites) and mestizos (in whom negro blood is mixed with Indian). The greater number of the negroes, who constitute about one-seventh of the population were until recently held in slavery but they are now all free. The gradual emancipation of the slaves was inaugurated in Sept. 1871 when a law was enacted providing that every child born of a slave mother after that date should be free, but obliged to serve the mother's master until 21 years of age. Finally in May 1888 an act was passed decreeing immediate and unconditional emancipation. There are large and flourishing German and Italian colonies in the southern part of the republic. The total population in 1890 the year of the last published census was 14,333,915 of whom 6,342,168 were classed as whites and 1,266,794 as pure Indians.

Prior to 1889 the government of Brazil was an hereditary monarchy but by a bloodless revolution effected in that year the monarchy was overthrown, the emperor (Dom Pedro II.) exiled, and a republic established under the name of the United States of Brazil. The new government, formed on the model of the government of the United States, comprises executive, legislative, and judicial departments, the first named consisting of a president, vice-president and cabinet, the second of a senate (of 63 members) and chamber of deputies (of 312 members) and the third of a federal supreme court and subordinate tribunals. The president and vice-president are elected by the direct votes of the people, and must have an absolute majority of the votes cast. Their term of office is four years. The members of the chamber of deputies are also elected by the voters of the several states, and hold office for three years. Senators are chosen by the state legislatures (three senators from each state) and hold office for nine years. The cabinet is constructed of six departments: Interior, Justice, State, and Public Instruction are under the President; War, Navy, and Treasury are under the President; Education is under the President. The states (excluding the District of Columbia) are divided into counties, each of which elects a representative to the state legislature. The state legislatures elect members to the federal House of Representatives. The federal government is composed of the President, the Vice President, the Supreme Court, and the federal district courts.

History—Brazil was discovered by Vicente Yáñez Pinzon a companion of Columbus, in 1499. In the same year the Portuguese commander Pedro Álvares Cabral was driven by adverse winds so far from his track that he landed on the coast of Brazil and took formal possession of it for his sovereign. The country was gradually colonized by the Portuguese, who formed a settlement at Rio de Janeiro in 1567. As a result of the seizure of Portugal by Philip II, the Dutch, in the course of the struggle which secured their liberation from Spain, made inroads upon Brazil treating it as their enemy's possession, and made themselves masters of a considerable part of it in the first half of the seventeenth century. After the re-establishment of Portuguese independence, however, the Dutch found it impossible to maintain their hold on their conquests. When Napoleon invaded Portugal and announced that the house of Bragança had come to reign (1807), the Portuguese court retired to Brazil. In 1815 Brazil was raised to the rank of a kingdom and became the head of its own mother country the monarchy being henceforth styled the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and Algarves. In 1821 the king John VI. returned to Portugal leaving his son Dom Pedro as regent. Revolutionary movements were instigated by many Brazilians who desired a separation from the mother country. Dom Pedro proclaimed the independence of Brazil in 1822 and assumed the title of emperor. In 1831 he abdicated the throne in favor of his son Dom Pedro II, a minor who was crowned in 1841 and who enjoyed a prosperous reign until the revolution of 1889 which led to the establishment of the Republic. In 1845 war was declared against Brazil and the Argentine Republic by López, dictator of Paraguay. A bloody struggle ensued of five years duration disastrous to Paraguay. Brazil was torn by a civil war in 1893-94.

Brasília, the seat was built by a civil war in 1933-34. The city, capital of Goiás, is on the Yacaré Line and is only 16 miles N.E. of Terra Haute. Its prosperity is derived chiefly from mining of block-iron and the manufacture of pig-iron from taconite iron-ore blast-furnaces and numerous shafts. It collects a block-iron, which is an excellent fuel for the smelting of iron-ore. Brasília has machine-shops, rolling-mills and manufactures of turboturbines, railroad spikes, milling machinery, boilers and engine accessories, brick and tiles, etc. Pop. in 1890 6,000. in 1900 7,750.

Bremen, brêm'men (L. Bre-ma) a state of the German Empire, with a republican form of government, styled officially the Free Hanse Town of Bremen. Area, 69 sq m. It consists principally of a level sandy tract surrounding the city of Bremen and divided by the river Weser the towns of Bremerhaven and Vegesack occupying each a small detached territory. The republic of Bremen with the exception of the Free Port of Bremen and Bremerhaven has belonged since 1888 to the Zollverein. It sends one representative to the imperial diet and has one vote in the federal council. Capital, Bremen. Pop. in 1900 224,697 nearly all Protestants.

Bremen, a city and next to Hamburg the principal maritime emporium of Germany capital of the republic of Bremen, on both banks of the Weser 40 miles SW of Hamburg. Lat. of the observatory 53° 4' 36" N lon 8° 48' 45" E. The city is divided by the river into the old town on the right and the new town on the left bank. In recent times extensive and handsome suburban quarters have arisen and in some of the other great cities of Germany are the dwelling-houses so largely occupied by single families. In the old town the streets are often narrow and crooked, and the houses are decorated in the style of the Middle Ages. The river is crossed by an old bridge and two modern bridges; the quays are extensive, and the old ramparts form agreeable promenades. Among the principal buildings are the Protestant (originally Catholic) cathedral the towers of which have recently been rebuilt, the church of St. Ansgarius, the fine old town-hall (with a sixteenth century Renaissance facade) under which is a famous Batacler (containing wine 250 years old), the building of the Chamber of Commerce (sixteenth century) the exchange (a modern Gothic edifice) the Imperial Bank post-office, trades hall, the Museum, and the building of the Society of Art. The city abounds in interesting old and modern public monuments and statues. Bremen has a vast foreign trade, much of which is conducted at the ports of Bremerhaven and Vegesack. It is a principal port for the shipment of emigrants to America, and is one of the greatest tobacco-markets in the world. It imports also much petroleum. It is the head-quarters of the North German Lloyd steamship lines. The Free Port of Bremen, on the W side of the Weser, constructed at great expense with the aid of the imperial government, consists of a basin 6500 feet long, about 400 feet wide, and about 23 feet deep, surrounded by immense warehouses and furnished with the most modern loading and unloading appliances. The city has extensive shipyards, rice-mills (which turn out immense quantities of starch), iron foundries, machine-shops, petroleum refineries, jute-spinning mills, breweries, distilleries, rope-works and manufactures of cigar-boxes and tobacco.

Bremen first rose into note about the year 788, when it was made the seat of a bishopric by Charlemagne. Subsequently the see was elevated to the dignity of an archbishopric, which, at the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648 was transferred in favor of Sweden. In the latter part of the Middle Ages the city gradually emancipated itself from the jurisdiction of the archbishops and became one of the most fourishing members of the Hanseatic League. The citizens early embraced the Reformation. After having been in the possession of France for a few years, Bremen was constituted by the Congress of Vienna, in 1815 one of the four free cities of the German Confederation. Bremen was a free port until 1868, when the city, with the exception of a small reservation, the new Free Port, was incorporated in the Imperial Zollverein. Pop. in 1909 163,292.

Brest (1) Bré-st; Fr. pron. the same as the English)
 a city of France, department of Finistère, about 35 miles

NW of Quimper and 350 miles by rail W of Paris, on the N shore of a small gulf called the Road of Brest. Lat.

(of observatory) 48° 25' 32" N lon 4° 59' 25" W It is the strongest maritime fortress of France, and is encircled by ramparts, which being planted with trees form agreeable promenades and afford a fine view of the harbor and shipping. From its natural advantages, the extent of its various establishments, and its means of defence, Brest is one of the finest in the world and has no superior in the safety and excellence of its anchorage. It is estimated that 400 men-of-war could ride at anchor in it at one time. It communicates with the sea by a single passage, called the

Goulet, 1750 yards broad, which is furnished with a number of light-houses. In the middle of this channel rise the Mingan Rocks, which contract the entrance and oblige ships to pass immediately under the batteries. From this entrance to the south of the Kormoran headland is about 6 miles in length. Its diameter varies considerably from the irregularity of the shores, but in some places it is 3 miles.

 The inner or military harbor is long narrow channel, the embouchure of the little river Penfeld is one of the most secure in the world. At its entrance, perched on a rock 300 feet high stands the imposing medieval castle, reconstructed by Vauban. Brest has large basins, extensive quays, an arsenal employing many thousands of men, vast magazines, building yards, large barracks, and storehouses.

The city built on the slopes of hills, is divided by the military port into two parts, which communicate by bridges. The new town, that on the right of the Penfeld, is called Neveveuve. The upper and lower parts of the town are connected by steep streets, and in some places only by stairs. On the shores of the commercial harbor a new quarter of the town has arisen. Brest has a naval school a school of hydrography a botanical garden, a large naval hospital, and an observatory. The trade of the town is

Bristol, bris'tol, a city and parliamentary borough of England, a county of itself but lying within the limits of Gloucestershire and Somersetshire, on the Avon, at its confluence with the Frome 8 miles from Bristol Channel and 118 miles by rail W of London. Several railways meet here. Bristol is one of the leading British ports in the foreign trade. It is noted for its fine public buildings among which are the cathedral (abbey church of St. Augustine) the Church of St. Mary Redcliffe, the guild hall, the museum and library the exchange, and University College. Among the charitable institutions are the famous Miller's Orphanage (at Ashley Down, and containing upward of 2000 children) and several public hospitals. Large ships can ascend the river to the city where spacious docks, quays, and ship-yards have been constructed and at Avonmouth 8 miles distant, there are additional facilities for unloading and freightage ships. The construction of vast (new) docks was begun here in 1902. Regular steam navigation across the Atlantic was first established from Bristol the pioneer steamship in this course, the Great Western, having been built here. Bristol is the seat of large and varied manufactures, prominent among which are those of metal-ware, soap, starch, tobacco, shoes, leather, silk, glass, cottons and chocolates. Its industries also comprise sugar refining. The large Bristol coal-field extends southward to Radstock. Pop. in 1891 221,666. In 1901 including Clifton (see Clifton) 228,945. The city sends 4 members to the House of Commons. Bristol appears in Anglo-Saxon records under the name of Briegstow. It was an important place in the latter part of the Middle Ages, and the enterprise of its merchants secured for it a prominent place in the history of maritime discovery, British colonization and the development of British foreign trade. It was long the second commercial emporium of England.

British Central Africa, a protectorate in east-central Africa, situated along the western and southern shores of Lake Nyasa, and extending southward (with the Shire Highlands) nearly to the Zambezi River. It is bounded westward by Rhodesia and the Portuguese possessions of eastern Africa. Area about 42,000 sq. m. Population estimated to be somewhat over 900,000, of whom only 400 are Europeans. The climate is fairly salubrious, and coffee, rice, wheat, oats, and barley are grown in some parts. Good roads are now being constructed throughout the region, which is in communication with the coast by means of lake and river steamboats. The chief city is Blantyre, with a population of about 8000 natives and 100 Europeans in the Shire Highlands. The seat of the administration is Zomba, and of the naval department Fort Johnston. The name of British Central Africa is sometimes applied to the region of northern Zambesia or northern Rhodesia, and also to Rhodesia in general. See RHODESIA and ZAMBEZIA.

British Columbia, a province of the Dominion of Canada, on the Pacific coast of North America extending from the Rocky Mountains westward bounded S. by the United States and limited on the N. by the 60th degree of N. lat. At the head of Smoky River about lat. 54° 40' N. its E. boundary leaves the Rocky Mountains crest and follows the meridian of 120° W. km. northward. Area, 377,630 sq. m. It includes Vancouver Queen Charlotte, and many minor islands. A large part of its surface is mountainous the southern half of the province being almost entirely covered by ranges or ridges of the main Rocky Mountains (which form the boundary with A. bet.) and the western (east or (needs Mountain) intermediate ranges (Go d Cariboo B. Kirk) take a t and generally parallel with those (NW -SE.). Some of the highest summits of the Dominion of Canada ranging from 10,000 to 11,000 feet, are found on or near the boundary Rocky Mountain chain and in the Selkirk Range. (See ROCKY MOUNTAINS and BRITISH COLUMBIA.) An elevated plateau extends for some distance westward, over a width of 100 miles, between the Gold and Coast Mountains. British Columbia has numerous rivers but their courses are largely turbulent, and most of them are not open to continuous navigation for any extended distance. The most important of these are the Columbia and Kootenay to the NE; the Fraser which traverses a large part of the province in a N. and S. direction and is its most important stream the Skeena, the Nass, and the Stikine the last named navigable by steamers for about 130 miles from the Pacific. All these streams are tributary to the Pacific Ocean. The Peace and Tard Rivers in the NE belong to the Arctic watershed. Some of the head-waters of the Yukon River are crossed by the northern boundary British Columbia has numerous lakes (Kootenay Arrow Shuswap, Kamloops, Okanagan, Quamash) most of which lie longitudinally in the course of traversing rivers. The surface of the country is largely timbered, being especially in the mountain and coast-regions densely covered with primordial forests of great extent. There are however extensive cultivable tracts, the major portion of which are to be found in the southern portion of the interior plateau. The mineral resources of the region are very large, and comprise gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, and platinum. Some of the more important mining districts or regions are the Cariboo, Cassiar, Kootenay (Kootenay Lake, Sloane Lake, Trail Creek) and Hazelton. Coal is extensively mined at Wellington, Nanaimo, and Comox, on Vancouver Island, but other deposits of lignite and bituminous are found elsewhere. The climate of British Columbia is beautiful, and more temperate than in other parts of Canada. The extremes of heat and cold are found within the interior or away from the coast. The rainfall on the Coast Mountains and along the Pacific border is high but it diminishes rapidly towards the interior and in some parts over the plateau it is reduced to 9 inches or less. British Columbia has an independent parliament and administration with a lieutenant-governor for its executive head. The legislative assembly (the single chamber) is composed of 88 members. British Columbia has 5 members in the Canadian senate and 7 members in the house of commons. The chief cities and towns are Victoria (the capital), New Westminster, Vancouver, Nanaimo, Ross, and Trail. Pop. in 1931, 49,459 in 1931, 98,173 in 1901, 173,657 exclusive of wild Indians.

British East Africa, an extensive equatorial territory in the E part of Africa, comprising the East Africa Protectorate, the Uganda Protectorate, and the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. It is bounded E by the Indian Ocean, Abyssinia, and Italian Somaliland, S by German East Africa and Lake Victoria Nyanza, W by the Congo Free State and French Ubangi, and merges N into the Egyptian Sudan and the independent Mohammedan states. The total area comprises probably upward of 1,000,000 sq. m. with a population of the mainland estimated to exceed 5,000,000 of whom hardly more than 700 are Europeans. The region which is traversed by the upper Nile and watered by the Sobat, Ghazal, the Sobat, Tana, and Lake Victoria, is largely an elevated plateau (3000-4000 feet) with lofty mountain masses (Kilimanjaro) and isolated volcanic cones (Kenia, Meru, and others) and contains either in whole or in part Lakes Victoria (Victoria Nyanza), Albert, Albert Edward, Rudolf, and Stefania. A large part of the surface, especially of the East Africa Protectorate, is covered with grass and well adapted for ranching purposes. Iron and copper are very abundant in the Uganda region. Railway and telegraphic communication has been extended from the coast to Uganda. (See COAST.) The chief commercial products and exports are ivory, rubber, gum, copal, hides, and skins. The inhabitants are largely Niam-Niam and other members of the Nilotic and Sudanese groups of Africans. Capital, Mombasa, with about 37,000 inhabitants. See MOMBASA and ZANZIBAR.

British Empire. See GRAT BRITAIN.

British Guiana (the Aik) a territory on the N coast of South America, belonging to Great Britain and considered to extend from the mouth of the Orinoco 8° 45' N lat. as far southward as 9° 45' N lat. and from about 56° 30' to 61° 30' W lon. which includes the western disputed region claimed by Great Britain in the Venezuela boundary rectification and which was adjudged to the colony by the Paris Arbitration Commission in Oct. 1894. The territory has on the E Dutch Guiana, N Brazil, and W Venezuela. Area, estimated at between 160,000 and 170,000 sq. m. The southern boundary with Brazil is officially recognized as formed by the Sierra Acarica which delimits the basin of the Essequibo River. The Corentyne River forms the boundary with Dutch Guiana. The surface of the country near the ocean is a rich elevated flat, extending in mud banks into the sea, and in and from 10 to 40 m. as, then ascending by successive terraces to the Sierra Pacaraima and Acarica on the SW and E frontiers. Mount Roraima, at one time thought to have an inaccessibly high summit, rises on the western border to a height of 8640 feet—the culminating point of the Pacaraima range and of the entire colony. The principal rivers are the Essequibo (with its tributaries, the Cayeni and Mazaruni), Demerara, Berbice, Corentyne, and Barima. The Essequibo, the longest, is about 600 miles in length but its course is rendered almost unfit for navigation by rapids. The other main streams are navigable for a hundred miles or more above their mouths. On the low grounds the climate is unhealthful. Dense forests clothe the interior. There are two rainy seasons on the coast and the rainfall is very heavy, the annual precipitation being from 130-140 inches. In the interior there is only one rainy season,—from April till the middle of August. The temperature ranges from 75° to 90° mean temperature of the year, 81°. The vegetation is luxuriant. Rice, sugar cane, corn, wheat, cacao, vanilla, tobacco, and cinnamon are raised. The exports consist chiefly of sugar, rum, molasses, timber, shingles and cotton,—considerably more than half of which are sent to Great Britain. Gold-mining is a moderate industry. The government is vested in a governor and council, and the orders of the sovereign in council. The colony is divided into the counties of Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo. Chief towns (Georgetown (the capital) and New Amsterdam. Pop. in 1899, 368,222. The inhabitants comprise about 7000-10,000 native Indians, about 200,000 Africans and Amlans (East Indians),—nearly equally distributed,—and the balance mainly Europeans (English and Portuguese). There are 104 m. as of rail roads in the colony, one line uniting Georgetown with Mahaboia.

British Hollow, a post-village of Grant Co. Wis. in Potter township, 12 miles W by S of Plattville.

British Honduras, or Belize, or Belize (Mexican-Spanish, Belize, la-lee), said to have been named from one Wah or buccaneer a British crown colony of Central America, bounded N by the state of Yucatan (Mexico) from which it is separated by the Rio Hondo, E by the Gulf of Honduras, S by Guatemala, and W by Guatemala. Area, 7500 sq. m. The coast is low and swampy, fenced from the open sea by lines of keys and islands. The W and E frontiers are mountainous, and dense forests abound. The Belize is the principal river. Mahogany, logwood, and sugar are leading exports. Agriculture is in its infancy. The climate is hot, moist, and unwholesome for white people, yet there are few epidemics, while earthquakes and hurricanes are unknown. The colony has a lieutenant-governor assisted by a legislative and executive council. Chief towns, Belize (the capital) and Corozal, in the extreme N. Pop. in 1891, 31,471 in 1890, 35,225 in 1901, 37,500.

British India. See INDIA.

British Isles, an archipelago off the W shore of the continent of Europe, from which it is separated by the English Channel, the strait of Dover, and the North Sea. The surrounding waters are in general shallow. There is sufficient evidence to show that in comparatively recent (geological) times the islands and islets, which all told number upward of 6000, were part of the continental mass. See GRAT BRITAIN, ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES, ISLANDS, KELP, ORCADEY, etc.

British New Guinea, a British possession in the NE part of the island of New Guinea, extending from East Cape in about lon 150° 55' E. to the furthest position on the river Fly on the W about lon 140° 45' E. It also includes the D'Entrecasteaux Islands, and other islands, and has a total area of about 90,540 sq. m. with a population estimated at 200,000 of whom less than 400 are Europeans. It has Dutch New Guinea on the W and German New Guinea (Kaiser Wilhelm-Land) on the N. A large portion of the western section of the region is hardly more than tide-level flat, but seaward the surface becomes ruggedly mountainous, the great Owen Stanley Range forming a ridge or backbone over a linear extent of 250-300 miles or more. Its loftiest summit is Mount Owen Stanley or Victoria, 13,121 feet in height. Other impressive craters are Mount Scabious 12,250 ft., Mount Albert Edward, 12,560 ft., Mount Douglas, 11,795 ft., and Mount Suckling, 11,228 ft. Mount Yulis in the western portion of the range, is a volcanic peak 10,045 ft. high. The only important river is the Fly (with its tributary the Strickland) which has been ascended by boats for upward of 600 m. from its mouth. The tidal influence is carried to a point 150 miles from the sea where the river is still 600 yards in width and 40 feet in depth. Much of the region is still imperfectly known and there are but few settlements of foreigners. Agriculture has been little attempted. The region exports pearl-shell, trepang, copra, and timber and there is some promise for rubber and coffee growth. Gold is worked in some parts. The seat of government is Port Moresby on the southern coast, which is also the headquarters of the London Missionary Society.

British North Borneo, a territory occupying the northern part of Borneo under the jurisdiction (with Labuan and the minor islands of Banguey and Balambangan) of the British North Borneo Company and administered by a governor. Area, 31,100 sq. m. It borders W on the China Sea, NE on the Sea of Mindoro, and E on the Sea of Celebes, and has over 200 miles of coast-line. The surface is mainly jungle, though mountainous in the interior, the main volcanic summit of Mount Kinabalu is 15,090 feet. (See BORNEO.) The region has good bays and harbors, but is deficient in rivers. The rainfall at Sandakan is 124 inches. The region produces timber, sugar, rice, tapioca, gum, coffee, pepper, gambier, gutta serena, sweet potatoes, tobacco, etc. exporting also wax, edible birds' nests, coconuts, seed-pearls, trepang, etc. Chief towns Sandakan (or Klopang) on Sandakan Bay E coast. It is accessible to the largest vessels. Pop. 7000 of the possession, 175,000.

British Somaliland (so-maw'-le-land), a protectorate on the N coast of the E horn of Africa, bordering on the Gulf of Aden. Area, about 68,000 sq. mi. It exports skins and hides, wetrich feathers, cattle, sheep, and game. Chief towns, Berbera, on the coast. Other considerable towns are Zella and Bulhar. Pop. Mohammedan and mainly nomadic, number unknown.

British Sound, Madagascar. See DISCO SAURIN.

British South Africa, or Southern Rhodesia, a territory in South Africa, between the Limpopo River on the S. and the Zambezi on the N., and composed of the two provinces of Matabelland and Mashedanland, with a combined area of 192,000 sq. mi. and a pop. of about 450,000 of whom about 12,000 are Europeans. The minerals include gold in extensive fields, silver, zinc-blende, copper, tin, antimony, arsenic, lead, and coal. A railway from the Cape penetrates to Bulawayo (part of the projected Cape to Cairo railway) with branches to Salisbury and the Victoria Falls and Selousbury is connected by rail with Beira on the coast of Portuguese East Africa. Telegraph and telephone systems are in operation. The region has been developed by the British South Africa Company under the administration of which all Rhodesia is operated. Capital, Salisbury. Brittany (Fr. Bretagne breh-tā) an old province in the NW of France, forming an extensive peninsula between the English Channel and the Atlantic Ocean, now comprised in the departments of Finistère, Côtes-du-Nord, Morbihan, Ille-et-Vilaine, and Loire-Inférieure. Its people are largely Celts, of the Cymric branch and in the first three of the above-mentioned departments generally speak the Armorican (or Breton) language, which resembles the Welsh. The rough and harsh character of the country, the picturesque ruins, the curious ancient monuments (telling of Druidic times), the quaint old towns and, above all, the appearance and speech of the rude but upright and fearless Breton peasantry who cling to their traditions and superstitions, combine to render Brittany one of the most interesting regions in Europe. The Breton fishermen and sailors are noted for their bravery. Among the chief towns of the region are Brest, Rennes, Saint-Malo, and Vannes. Brittany was known to the ancient Romans as Armorica (Armorica). At the time of the decline and downfall of the Roman Empire there was an influx of Celtic immigrants from Britain into the region which received the name of Little Britain or Brittany. In the Middle Ages Brittany was generally independent under its counts and dukes. It was for a time an object of contention between England and France. The marriage of the Duchess Anne with Charles VIII. in 1491 made it a part of France. It was allowed to retain extensive liberties. In the Revolution its people rallied to the support of royalty.

Brooklyn, a former city of Kings co., N. Y. since Jan 1 1898 a borough of the city of New York, situated at the W end of Long Island. Lat. of the navy yard, 40° 41' 30" N; lon 73° 59' 20" W. The borough is coextensive with Kings county. A strait called the East River in its narrowest part about a half mile in width and connecting Long Island Sound with the upper New York Bay separates Brooklyn from Manhattan Island while the navigable Newtown Creek separates it from Long Island City (now a part of Queens borough of the city of New York) on the N and NE. The northern part of Brooklyn consists of the former city of Williamsburg and the town of Greenpoint. In the west central part of the city is a debouchment of the East River known as Wallabout Bay on the E. and E. shores of which is located the United States navy yard. Brooklyn covers an area of about 65 sq. m. the most distinctive topographic feature of which is constituted by the Brooklyn or Columbia Heights, which rises abruptly above the shore of the East River to an elevation of 70-100 feet, and on which are located many of the most elegant mansions, residences, and club-houses (Hamilton Jefferson Brooklyn) of the city. The most fashionable streets of the Heights are Clinton, Remsen, Montague and Pierrepont. The principal business street of Brooklyn is Fulton Street, which terminates near the great Brooklyn Bridge, which unites the borough with the lower part of New York city proper. Near the extreme southern end of the city situated upon a high ridge and overlooking Gowanus Bay, New York Bay and New York city with views of Jersey City and Staten Island, is the famed Greenwood Cemetery, covering 475 acres; while on the same ridge is situated Prospect Park, covering 520 acres, which with the magnificent boulevard connected with it (forming a continuous drive to the beach at Coney Island) and the handsome streets adjoining, forms the most attractive portion of the borough. Washington or Fort Green Park, in the older section of Brooklyn, is a charming pleasure-ground. In the district of East New York is Ridgewood Reservoir from which Brooklyn receives its main supply of water.

Numerous lines of steam ferry boats connect the various sections of Brooklyn with New York proper and other lines connect it with Jersey City. The East River Suspension Bridge, commonly known as the Brooklyn Bridge, was opened May 24 1883, and gives accommodation to railway traffic as well as foot-passage and carriages. It has a total length of 5987 feet, with a central span of 1595 feet and a breadth of 85 feet. The height above the water is 155 feet. The total cost of construction involved in a period of 13 years (1870-83) was about $15,000,000. Another suspension bridge to unite New York with Brooklyn, about 1 mile to the N.E. of the Brooklyn Bridge, was begun in 1897 and opened in 1904. Its dimensions are much larger than those of the older bridge, there being accommodations for 6 railway tracks, in addition to the carriage-ways and walks. A third bridge between these two is now (1905) in course of construction, and the East River is being tunneled at a great depth. Brooklyn is the terminus of branches of the main Long Island railway system, connecting it with Greenport and Sag Harbor and all the principal points on Long Island. The system of street and suburban railways including several lines of elevated roads, is very extensive. Freight-cars are also brought to the Brooklyn docks and warehouses by boats and steam-tugs, great numbers of which are employed in this business.

The Atlantic Dock on Bitternilk Channel, opposite Governors' Island and 1 mile S of Fulton Ferry and the Erie and Brooklyn Basins, all in South Brooklyn, are among the most extensive works of the kind in the United States, and are lined with immense storehouses for grain and other freight. The Atlantic Dock or Basin, erected by a company incorporated in 1846, embraces within its piers 40.85 acres. The Erie and Brooklyn Basins have areas respectively of 60 and 40 acres. The United States navy yard occupies about 45 acres of ground. It is the chief naval station of the United States, and employs over 2000 men. Associated with it are two dry-docks having lengths of 465 feet and 707 feet respectively. Near the navy yard is the huge Wallabout Market, erected of brick in the Dutch style. The manufacturing interests of Brooklyn are large and varied. The refining of sugar and petroleum, the milling of coffee and spices, ship building, meat-packing and the storage of freight are great industries. There are numerous large chemical works, and factories for making glass, clothing caps, carpets, cordage, paints, lined oil, cloth, pharmaceutical preparations, metallic wares, tobacco, cigars, castings, steam-boilers, hats, wire, lace, buttons, paper and felt goods.

Among the public buildings and institutions are the court-house, the old city hall, the new borough hall, Academy of Music, with a seating capacity of 2400. Academy of Design Brooklyn Library (containing 160,000 volumes) Pratt Library and Institute (one of the best-equipped technical institutions of the country attended by upward of 2000 students) Long Island Historical Society (with a library of 70,000 volumes) Pecker Collegiate Institute (female) Polytechnic Institute, and the Brooklyn Institute. The last-named, with a building about 425 feet square, occupies a site in Prospect Park and contains 25 departments devoted to the study of the arts and sciences. The charitable institutions are very numerous. Brooklyn has upward of 450 ecclesiastical edifices and has frequently been designated the City of Churches. Its most famous churches and one that is perhaps best known throughout the whole United States, is Plymouth Church.

On Aug. 27 1776, the battle of Long Island, as dimensions to the American forces, was fought upon ground now within the limits of Prospect Park and at Wallabout Bay during the Revolutionary War were stationed the English prison-ships, in which it is said nearly 12,000 Americans perished from close confinement and other ill-treatment. The King's Highway the road by which the British marched from Gravesend Bay near the suburban town of Bensonhurst, is now a favorite driveway.

Brooklyn was incorporated in the year 1446 by the authorities of New Amsterdam and named Brookelen from a town of the same name in the Netherlands. It was incorporated as a village in 1818, and as a city with the same area, 6 miles long and 4 miles wide, in 1834. In 1853 Brooklyn, Williamsburg, and Bushwick were united under one government. In 1896 the city was made co-extensive with Kings county, and in Jan., 1898, united with the city of New York to constitute the borough of Brooklyn. The number of its inhabitants in 1810 was 4693; in 1820, 1175; in 1830, 15,395; in 1840 26,123; in 1850, 50,558; in 1860 266,661; in 1870, 398,698; in 1880, 564,663; in 1890, 600,343; in 1900 1,164,582.

Bruges, brüjz (Fr. pron. brüsh; Dutch, Brugge, brüg'ghä,—i.e., bridges. Ger. Brügge, brüg'ghä L. Bruggen), a city of Belgium, capital of the province of West Flanders, at the junction of several large canals, 45 miles NW of Brussels and 14 miles by rail E. of Ostend. It owes its name to the number of bridges (upward of 60) which cross its canals. The city to a great extent presents a mediæval appearance. Its many quaint old houses with their decorated gables, and its splendid churches and other public edifices, standing on streets and squares once bustling with life, but now comparatively deserted are memorials of the time when Bruges was one of the proudest cities of Christendom. Among the most remarkable buildings are the mediæval edifices known as Lee Halles (cloth- and meat-halls) with its famous beffy 350 feet high and magnificent chimes, the old town-hall, recently restored containing the municipal library of 100 000 volumes, the church of Notre Dame, with its lofty spire and the tomb of Charles the Bold and his daughter Mary of Burgundy the cathedral of St. Sauveur with its fine interior ornamentation and paintings. St. John's Hospital more than 500 years old containing some of the master pieces of Flemish the Episcopal seminary (the former Abbey of the Dunes) and the Palais de Justice. Bruges possesses fine old and modern sculptural monuments. The manufactures include lace, textiles, and tobacco, and there are breweries, distilleries, and ship-building yards. The trade of the town is considerable. In no large city of western Europe is the proportion of indigent persons in the population so great as in Bruges.

In the ninth century Bruges was fortified by Baldwin of the Iron Arm, first Count of Flanders and it was first walled in 1053. Early in the fourteenth century the city had waxed rich and powerful and in the Hanseatic League it took the leading rank as the central mart of middle northern Europe. Under the house of Burgundy Bruges still increased in riches and power. In 1430 Philip the Good here instituted the Order of the Golden Fleece. In 1488, Bruges rose in rebellion against Maximilian of Austria and laid hands on his person. The severe measures of repression which ensued gave a blow to the city's prosperity which had already been affected by the rise of Ghent and Antwerp and its ruin was afterwards nearly completed by the Dutch of Alva. Its population once exceeded 200 000. Pop. in 1891 47 872. In 1901 52,957.

Brunswick (Ger. Brunschweig brööm shöig) Duchy or one of the states of the German Empire. It consists of three larger and six smaller divisions detached from one another and enclosed within other states. The principal division containing Brunswick (the capital) and the towns of Wolfenbüttel and Helmstedt is of a compact and oval form with the exception of a narrow strip towards the NE. On the N. W. and S. W. it is surrounded by the Prussian provinces of Hanover and on the S. and E. by Prussian Saxony. The second largest division containing the towns of Lüneburg and Osterholz is a long, irregular belt stretching from E. to W. across South Hanover and bounded on the E. by Prussian Saxony and on the W. by Westphalia, Hanover and Waldeck. To the SE of this division lies the third with the town of Diepholz; also irregular in shape, traversed by the Harz Mountains and surrounded by territories almost entirely Prussian. The smaller divisions are within Prussian territory. The entire area is 1425 sq. m.

The surface of Brunswick is mostly mountainous or hilly. The country is drained by the Weser and its tributaries—among which are the Aller, Leine, and Oker—and by some small tributaries of the Elbe. Some parts of the duchy yield rich crops. In others the raising of live-stock receives great attention. The growing of fruit and vegetables is extensively carried on. There is a large area of forest land, mainly the property of the state. Brunswick is rich in mineral wealth. Coal, iron and lead are mined in considerable quantities. Other mineral products are gold, silver, antimony, zinc, copper, sulphur, vitriol, alum, asphalt, marble, diabase, limestone, gypsum, potter's clay, asbestos, agate, Jasper and flint. The population of the duchy was, in 1875 327,408, in 1890 403,773, in 1900 464,251. The people are nearly all Protestants. Brunswick is represented by 2 members in the federal council of the German Empire and sends 3 members to the Reichstag.

Brunswick rose into prominence with Henry the Lion Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, with whom the house of Guelf (Wolf) reached the height of its power. When that prince succumbed to the emperor Frederick Barbarossa in 1151 he was allowed to retain possession of Brunswick. In 1235 Brunswick, with Lüneburg, was erected into a duchy for a grandson of Henry. The possession of the Guephs underwent endless divisions and subdivisions, until finally there were the two dukes of Brunswick-Lüneburg and Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. In 1692 the dominions of the Dukes of Brunswick-Lüneburg were erected into the Electorate of Hanover. On the extinction of the elder line of the house of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel in 1804, the claims of the Duke of Cumberland, the head of the Hanover line, were set aside by the federal council of the German Empire on the ground that his reign would be incompatible with the peace of the Empire. The people of Brunswick acquiesced, and in 1806 the regency was handed over to Prince Albert of Prussia. The house of Brunswick-Lüneburg (Hanover) ascended the throne of England in 1714, in the person of George I.

Brunswick (L. Brunsvorice) a city of Germany, capital of the duchy of the same name, 36 miles SE. of Hanover. Lat. 52° 10' N. lon. 10° 31' E. Hardly another large city of Germany has to so great an extent preserved its medieval aspect as Brunswick. Many of the dwellings, with their richly carved wooden façades are from 300 to 400 years old. The most prominent of the numerous and splendid medieval churches is the cathedral the erection of which was begun in 1173 by Henry the Lion the famous Guelph ruler with whose history the city is closely associated, and whose tomb, with those of many of his successors, is in the edifice. Among other interesting buildings are the exquisite Gothic town hall of the old town, the town-hall of the new town, the new ducal palace which is crowned by a magnificent quadriga, the famous Gewandhaus (trades hall) with its richly ornamented façade, the old municipal weigh-house, the grand railway-station, and infantry barracks. The old ramparts have been converted into promenades and lovely gardens, among which is the ducal park with a new court theatre. Brunswick abounds in interesting and beautiful medieval and modern monuments, among the latter being the statues of Learning, Gaus, and Abt. The city contains various museums, at the head of which is the ducal museum of art and a technological institute of a high order. The industries of Brunswick are very varied, comprising the manufacture of machinery, boilers, sewing machines, safes, pianos, sugar, chocolate, carpets etc. jute-spinning and the preparation of food-stuffs. There are also iron foundries, chemical works, tanneries, distilleries and type-foundries. The town has an extensive trade, but its once-famous fairs have lost their importance. Lat. of the observatory 50° 51' 11" N. lon 4° 22' 10" E. Brussels is the most important city in the kingdom. It is remarkable for the number and richness of its ancient buildings, and from the elegance of its new quarters it ranks among the finest cities of Europe. It consists of an upper or new and a lower or old town the former of which with the modern Quarter Leopold, is the fashionable quarter and contains the royal palace, the government offices, and the finest streets and hotels. It is well supplied with water and has many richly sculptured fountains. The lower town with its medieval guildhouses and the magnificent Hôtel de Ville facing the large market-place is devoted almost entirely to industry, and commerce, and is in marked contrast to the newer development of the city of which the broad and elegant boulevards are perhaps the most conspicuous feature. The so-called Inner Boulevards, constructed in part over the bed of the Senne for a length of 1 1/2 miles, date from 1867-71 and intersect the lower town in various directions. The focus of the busy and fashionable life of the city is found in the Place Royale and its adjacent streets (Rue Royale, Rue de la Régence, etc.) and park the last a former ducal hunting ground, laid out in its present form subsequent to 1774. Of the ancient fortifications no relic remains except the Porte de Hal, a baronial looking bastion erected late in the fourteenth century, which long served in later days as a prison.

The principal squares of the city are the Place Royale, Place de la Monnaie, with the theatre, Place des Martyrs, Place de Brouckere, with its large fountain erected in 1897. Place Souppes, Place du Froid and the Grand Place in the lower town on which is the Hôtel de Ville, one of the finest medieval squares in Europe. Among the more important modern buildings are the royal palace, the Palais des Académies formerly the palace of the Princes of Orange and now housing the royal academy of sciences arts medicine, and letters, the palace of the nation serving for the sittings of the senate and chamber of deputies, the national bank conservatory of music, the palace of the fine arts (built in 1875-81 and containing a most valuable collection of paintings and sculptures) exchange, and the Palais de Justice, the last-named built in 1866-83, being the largest architectural work of the nineteenth century and one of the most imposing of modern structures. It is built in the Ormoo-Romen style, and stands upon a quadrangular block measuring 590 by 560 feet. The cost of construction was 45,000,000 francs. The ancient buildings comprise the Hôtel de Ville (in the grand hall of which the abdication of Charles V. took place in 1555) one of the noblest buildings of the kind in Europe, with a spire of open stone-work 364 feet in height; several churches, in general decorated with rich sculptures and paintings, the finest of which is the cathedral of St. Gudula, begun about 1220 and celebrated for its painted glass, numerous statues, and finely carved pulpit the church of Notre Dame de la Chapelle, commenced in 1134, and that of Notre Dame des Victoires, founded in 1304 the Broet-Huys or old Hôtel de Ville, and several gates of the ancient walls. Three miles N. of the park is the country palace of Laeken. Brussels has numerous and excellent institutions of public instruction, chief among which are the free university (founded in 1834, and attended by upward of 1000 students) and the polytechnic school founded in 1873 with about 1000 enrolled students. The royal library contains upward of 450,000 volumes. Among its rich scientific and literary institutions are the astronomical observatory one of the best in Europe, the general depot for the archives of the kingdom, the museum of natural history and antiquities, and an ex-excellent botanical garden. The private collections comprise the library of the Hollandists and that of the geographical establishment of Vandermaelen with a rich collection of maps.

Brussels is one of the great centres of Belgian industry and it is still celebrated for its lace, considered the finest in the world; its other chief manufactures are of fine linens, silk, woollen and cotton fabrics, gold and silver embroidery, bronzes, leather gloves paper machinery, jewelry and mathematical and musical instruments. It has also establishments for coach-building and cabinet-making, manufactures of chemical products, soap, porcelain, and crystal and extensive sugar refineries and breweries. The making of Brussels carpets is not an industry of the city. The city has many large typographical and lithographic establishments, which are largely employed in the reprinting of works published in France.

The Emperor Otto I dated a decree apud Bracellum, in 978. The town was not fortified until about 1044, when Lambert Balderic, Count of Louvain and Brussels, built a wall with seven gates, around it. It had grown to be a thriving and populous city tenacious of its privileges when Brabant passed, in 1430 into the possession of the dukes of Burgundy. Under the rule of the houses of Hapsburg it became early in the sixteenth century the usual seat of government for the entire Low Countries. It played an important part in the first stages of the revolt against Spain and was terribly chastised by Alva. It was in the possession of the French from 1794 until 1814 as capital of the department of the Dyle. In 1831 it became the capital of the kingdom of Belgium. Pop. in 1860 74,425; in 1876 157,000. The manufactures are still restricted to a narrow range, most articles other than those of the plain workmanship being imported from abroad. The trade of the place is very considerable much of it being in the hands of Germans and Jews. Bucharest has recently been surpassed by a line of fortifications on a vast scale a great feature of which are the revolving turrets. The works when completed will embrace a polygonal inner wall in addition to the circle of outer forts. The climate is very variable. The city is exposed to violent winds and subject to drought. The mercury occasionally rises to about 100° and sometimes descends below zero. There are a number of attractive resorts in the vicinity. The population in 1899 was 252,971. There were about 200,000 Orthodox Greeks, 43,000 Jews, and 37,000 Catholics and Protestants. A treaty was concluded at Bucharest between Rumania and Turkey in 1812 by which the frontiers of Rumania were advanced to the river Pruth.

the official title of Budapest. Lat. 47° 39' N.; lon. 19° 4' E. Of the two sections of the municipality Buda is much the older. It stands on the slope of a hill, immediately N of the dolomite hill known as the Buda (394 feet above the river) and at the E foot of the Schwanenberg (1443 feet above the sea) and is built in the form of an amphitheatre, having in its centre the fortress enclosing the royal palace (recently reconstructed and containing 860 rooms), the Matthias church, restored in 1890-96, the national educational museum, teachers' seminary, etc. Buda is now connected by 5 bridges with Pest, two of which are suspension bridges the earliest being that constructed by Clark in 1840-49 1230 feet in length. In contrast with Buda, Pest is essentially a modern town, the growth principally of the nineteenth century and to-day it takes rank as one of the finest and most imposing cities of the continent, being retrenched and surrounded by broad and architecturally elegant boulevards (Inner Ringstrasse, Outer Ringstrasse) and having a number of fine squares or plazas. The Franz-Josef Quay which skirts the Danube for about 1 mile and from which vehicles are excluded is the fashionable recreation promenade of the city while the Andrássy út (street), leading out to the very attractive city park (Városliget or Stadtpark) is the equally fashionable driveway. Under the Andrássy út extends an electric railway, whose beautifully constructed subway well reflects the progressive spirit of the citizens. Among the more important buildings and institutions of the city are the academy containing the national picture-gallery formerly known as the Esterházy Gallery and a library of 200,000 volumes, the art industrial museum, old house of representatives Leopoldstadt basilica, the Neue Künstlerhaus (built in 1874) the opera-house a superb Italian renaissance building erected in 1875-84 the Kurie (seat of the supreme court) and the lavishly decorated new parliament house, a vast architectural pile built immediately on the Danube front, covering 34 acres, and surmounted by a central dome 350 feet in height.

Budapest is well endowed with educational and scientific institutions. The national academy removed hither from Tyrnau in 1780 is one of the most thoroughly organized in Europe, and in 1904 was attended by upward of 5778 students. The Joseph polytechnic institute has also a large faculty. The national museum has extensive collections in art and science, and a library of nearly 450,000 volumes. Budapest still retains many characteristics that pertain to the Orient, and its life is often described as being a gay union of that of the East and of the West. No city of Europe, excepting perhaps, Paris surpasses it in the intensity of search after pleasure and none more thoroughly reflects the national life of a country.

In the Danube, opposite the upper end of the city is the Margaret Island (island) with baths and a delightful park a much-frequented recreation spot for all classes. Numerous thermal, chalybeate and sulphurous springs are found on the Buda side of the city and have been adapted to baths. Of these perhaps the best known is the Kaiserbad, with a temperature of the ten or more springs ranging from 50° to 150°. The principal industries of the city are those pertaining to the produce of the country—the milling of the celebrated Hungarian flour, tobacco manufactures, sugar refining, etc. Budapest is the outlet of the extensive grain trade of the country. The vineyards of Buda yield a noted wine.

A Roman colony existed on the site now occupied by Old Buda (Alt-Ofen) under the name of Aquinum (Aquincum) remains of which are still visible. A flourishing colony of Germans grew up here in the Middle Ages on both sides of the Danube. The name Pest came to be restricted to the town on the E bank while the town on the opposite bank became known by the German name of Ofen, corresponding to the Hungarian name Pest, an appellation derived from a Slavonic word and having presumably, reference to a sun baked location or the presence of hot springs or else, what is considered more probable, to the existence of lime-kilns or something of the sort. The Hungarians applied the name Buda to Ofen. Buda was favored by the Hungarian monarchs, and finally became the virtual capital of the kingdom. From 1541-1686 it was in the hands of the Turks, and was the seat of a Turkish pasha. For some time after the expulsion of the Turks Pest remained an insignificant town but gradually outstripped Buda in the course of the eighteenth century. In 1840 the combined population of the two cities was about 180,000. Pest was the seat of the national Hungarian government in the first part of the revolutionary struggle of 1848-49. In 1867 as capital of the Hungarian kingdom in the reconstructed Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, it became one of the great political centres of Europe. Since 1873, Pest and Buda have formed one city. The population of Budapest in 1880 was 340,551, of whom about one-fifth resided in Buda. In 1890 it had risen to 492,337 and in 1900 it amounted to 713,363. The bulk of the population are Roman Catholics, about one-fifth are Jews. About one-fourth of the people speak German.

Buenos Aires, hwdn 1 rd., formerly written Buenos Ayres (Le good air) the largest and most important city of South America, a federal district and capital of the Argentine Republic, is situated on the west side of the Plate estuary here 30 miles wide, and about 150 miles from the sea. Lat. 34° 36' 21" S.; lon. 58° 21' 33" W. It is the objective point and terminus of several railways, and stands on a perfectly level plain. It is regularly laid out, all its streets crossing one another at right angles. The houses are in the main still of a single story enclosing a central court, but the business portions of the city and in the newer residence-quarters near them, substantial architectural structures have been erected, and there are numerous palatial mansions designed after Parisian Italian Spanish, Moorish, and Norwegian patterns. None of the older South American cities has so completely lost its national characteristics as Buenos Aires. The principal square is the Plaza de la Victoria, on which are the government buildings (Palacio de Gobierno), the cabildo or hall of justice, the cathedral (resembling the Madeleine of Paris) and the archbishop's palace. Other important buildings are institutions of the city are the opera-house, several theatres and the sumptuous terminal depot of the Great Northern railway. Modern boulevards are replacing many of the old and narrow streets, and among them the Avenida de Mayo is the finest. Buenos Aires has numerous educational and scientific institutions of a high order among which are the university (with extensive faculties and about 2,000 students), a national library, museum of natural history (with most important paleontological collection), zoological garden and observatory. The city is provided with an elaborate system of water works, the supply of water being obtained from a distance of several miles. Its tramway connections and ramifications are markedly in advance, and minister to the needs of the surrounding rural communities. Palermo Park and the Recoleta furnish the fashionable and recreation concourses.

The trade, and consequently the prosperity of Buenos Aires have until recently been much impeded by the difficulty of navigating the Plata and the want of a safe and commodious harbor which have compelled large vessels to remain several miles below the city. The establishment of a city port and port of entry at Ensenada, on the Bay of Ensenada, about 27 miles distant, and the utilization of the Riachuelo Channel in connection with the construction of vast harbor works and docks, channel excavations, etc. have materially lessened the difficulties of shipment and unloading and added to the commercial development of the city. The new Madero docks, begun in 1887 have a city frontage of 2 miles. The climate of Buenos Aires is moist and variable, but regarded as healthy, though severe epidemics of yellow fever sometimes occur and rheumatic affections are very prevalent. The mean temperature of the year is about 65° of July approximately the coldest month 50° and of January 75°. The yearly rainfall is 34 inches. Buenos Aires is the commercial metropolis of the republic. It exports large quantities of hides, horns, bone-oil, bones, beef tallow, hair and other cattle products, ostrich feathers, wool, live-stock, etc. Its manufactures which were wholly wanting a quarter of a century ago, are acquiring some importance. The environs of the city are very beautiful consisting of well-cultivated fields, and cultivated by numerous country residences called quintas the most wealthy have their country-seats surrounded with gardens. The foreign contingent is largely located in the suburbs of Belgrano, Flores, and Trujillo. Buenos Aires was founded by the Spaniards in 1535. Pop. in 1869 177,787, in 1886 392,498, in 1900 (close of the year) 521,367. Area of the federal district, 72 sq. m.

Buenos Aires, the most populous and most flourishing of the provinces of the Argentine Republic, extends from the mouth of the Rio Negro, lat. 41° S., to near Rosario, on the Paraná River, and from the Atlantic border on the E. to about lon. 63° 20' W. Area, about 120,000 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 521,367, calculated for the close of 1900 1,140,867. The N. part includes a portion of the eastern Patagonia, and is flat, with lakes and swamps. The S. part comprehends the low hills of the Sierras del Ventana and Ventana. The principal river is the Salado. The climate is humid and variable, but intensely hot in summer. Occasionally there are years of excessive drought, and hurricanes (pampeiros) are not infrequent. The soil is exceedingly fertile in many parts, but the greater portion of the region still lacks cultivation and has been given over to the raising of live-stock (sheep, cattle, etc.). Hides, hair, horns, phosphates, wool, bones, beef-extract, ostrich feathers, tallow, and jerked beef are the chief exports. Horses, mules, and asses are also exported. The cultivation of the cereals has latterly been materially extended, and wheat and corn are now exported. Capital (since 1852) La Plata.

Buffalo, a city port of entry and seat of justice of Erie co., N. Y. is situated at the eastern extremity of Lake Erie, in lat. 42° 35' N. lon. 78° 55' W. 352 miles W. of Albany by the Erie Canal and 300 miles by the New York Central and Hudson River R. Other railroads crossing here are the Pennsylvania, the Erie, the Lackawanna, the West Shore, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Lehigh Valley, the Grand Trunk, etc.

The city has a wharf frontage of over 7 miles, and extends along the Niagara River which is crossed here by the International Bridge, completed in 1873 at a cost of about $1,500,000. The site on the lake-front gradually rises, and at the distance of about 2 miles becomes an extended undulating plain 55 feet above the water-level of the harbor. The more elevated portion of the site affords fine views of the city, the Niagara River, the Canadian shore, the lake and bay and the hilly country to the SE. Buffalo, especially the west side residence portion, is handsomely built. Among its more noteworthy thoroughfares are Main Street, Delaware Avenue, Front Avenue, Niagara Street, Broadway and the Humboldt Parkway. Most of the important streets are traversed by electric trams, which are operated by power generated by the Niagara Falls. A belt railroad makes the circuit of the city. At the point where the waters of the lake merge in the Niagara River, Buffalo Creek enters the lake from the E. and the Erie Canal from the NW being nearly parallel in their passage through the city and harbor. The streets in the more elevated portions of the city are bordered with a profusion of shade-trees, and there are numerous elegant residences and imposing mercantile and office structures. The Biltmore Square building is one of the largest office-buildings in the world, and accommodates a company numbering 4000-5000.

Favorably located for business, and with many advantages as a place of residence, Buffalo shows a ratio of increase in population far above the average of that of cities in the eastern and older portion of the United States, taking rank as the eleventh in population in the census of 1890 and eighth in the census of 1900. The city claims to be the cleanest, best-lighted and healthiest city in the United States, with the best water and the best and most complete sewerage. It has an ample water-supply obtained from the Niagara through a tunnel extending nearly to the middle of the river. Among the more noteworthy buildings and institutions of Buffalo are the government building, city hall (with a tower 200 feet high), the public library with over 200,000 volumes (the building also containing the rooms and collections of the Fine Arts Academy, the Buffalo Historical Society and the Buffalo Society of Natural Sciences), the university comprising departments of medicine, law, dentistry and pharmacy, the Grosvenor library and the state insane asylum. The city is well provided with charitable and ecclesiastical institutions and among the churches may be mentioned the Gothic St. Paul's, the Trinity church and the synagogue. The Erie county almshouse is located here. The city has in addition to other parks a magnificent public park of 442 acres, and there is a tastefully laid-out cemetery of 75 acres, called the Forest Lawn in the suburbs. The only living gigantic coal-elevators are a feature of the city.

Buffalo is an important and prosperous centre of trade, and has extensive manufactures. Its commerce has made prodigious strides during many years,—a fact due to its location at the outlet of the great chain of lakes, and to its being the terminus of the Erie Canal and of the various trunk railroad lines that converge here and give direct communication with many of the more important commercial foci of the country. Through its intermediate position and facilities for shipping Buffalo is made the center of a large portion of the trade between the East and the Northwest. Grain is the most important article of commerce and the facilities for handling and storing it are unequalled by those of any other city on this continent. The growth of this branch of trade may be estimated by the fact that it was only in 1843 that Joseph Dart built the first grain-elevator here, and that the storing capacity of the elevators to-day is nearly 10,000,000 bushels, with facilities for transferring upward of 5,000,000 bushels per day. Buffalo is now the eastern distributing centre of western flour in the live-stock trade Buffalo is second to Chicago only. The city has also a large trade in anthracite and bituminous coal received from Pennsylvania and distributed both westward and eastward, and it is now the distributing point of nearly all of the west-bound anthracite coal shipping yearly several million tons by lake alone. The lumber trade is also very important, the annual receipts in shipment rising to 600,000,000-700,000,000 feet. In iron and steel manufacturing and working Buffalo ranks next to Pittsburgh. Among the other industries of the city are those of ear building, oil-refining, distilling and brewing, the manufacture of clothing, soap, starch and leather, slaughtering, meat-packing, etc.

Buffalo, originally laid out by the Holland Company in 1803-04, became in 1812 a military post. It was burnt in Dec. 1813 when of the 200 houses composing the village all but two were destroyed by the British and Indians. In April, 1832 it was incorporated as a city, and in 1853 it assumed its former rival Black Rock. Pop. in 1810 1508; in 1820 2094; in 1830 8653; in 1840 18,213; in 1850 42,261; in 1860 55,500; in 1870 117,714; in 1880 155,134; in 1890 255,664; and in 1900 352,387, an increase of nearly 40 per cent in a decennium. Bulgaria, a principality in the Balkan peninsula, in most respects independent, but owing allegiance and paying tribute to Turkey. It is bounded on the N by Rumania (Wallachia and the Dobruja) on the E by the Black Sea, on the S and SW by Turkey (Thrace Macedonia, the vilayet of Kessovo) and on the W by Serbia. It comprises Bulgaria proper—that is the original principality of Bulgaria as constituted by the European powers in 1318—and the former so-called autonomous province of Eastern Rumelia, constituted in 1878 and united with Bulgaria in 1885-86. It lies between lat 41° 3' and 44° 10' N and lon 22° 20' and 29° 30' E Its area, according to recent calculations, is 17,200 sq m (according to older measurements about 1000 miles greater) of which about 13,000 sq m belong to Eastern Rumelia. Bulgaria includes the greater part of the Balkan mountain region and most of the surface is mountainous or hilly. The northern part of the country belongs to the basin of the lower Danube, which forms most of the boundary with Rumania. This portion is mainly an extensive plain which rises in successive stages to the base of the Balkans and is furrowed by the deep valleys of the rivers that flow northward towards the Danube. The Balkans extend westward from the shores of the Black Sea through the middle of the principal valley and attain an elevation of nearly 8000 feet. The most noted of the Balkan passes is the Shipka Pass. In the NW corner the Rhodope Mountains (Dzupote Dag) rise to the peak of Musesala to a height of 9600 feet. A little farther to the W the Rilo-Dag reaches an elevation of nearly 9000 feet. The principal affluents of the Danube are the Tinnok forming part of the boundary between Bulgaria and Serbia, the Inker the Vid, Ouma, Yantra, and the Lom. The principal stream flowing into the Black Sea is the Kamotitza or Kamotik Eastern Rumelia which is on the S side of the Balkans, drains mainly into the Aegean Sea through the tortuous Maritza, which receives the Tunja. Bulgaria has extensive forests, confined however mainly to the elevated regions. They abound in game of all kinds, including bears, wolves, wild boars, lynxes, deer and badgers. The soil and climate are adapted to the growth of all kinds of European crops. The commons are short, hot, and excessively dry so that the landscape assumes a sun-burnt appearance but the spring and autumn bring copious rains. The winter cold is often very severe. The climate on the whole is healthy although some of the principal cities suffer from malaria. The fields yield beautiful crops of wheat, maize, rye, barley, oats and millet, and large quantities of pulse and garden-vegetables are raised. On the southern slopes of the Balkans, in Eastern Rumelia, near Kazanlik is a paradise of rose-gardens, whose product is converted into attar of roses. Flax hemp, and tobacco are grown and among other products are silk and honey. The soil is well adapted to the cultivation of the vine. In addition to the larger cattle (among which are many buffaloes used in tillage) there are immense numbers of sheep and goats. Bulgaria is almost entirely an agricultural country. The mineral resources are not important, and the manufactures are still confined mainly to the production on a small scale of textiles, leather articles and metallic wares. There are productive fisheries in the Black Sea. The railway mileage is about 1000

The population of the principality according to the census of Jan 1, 1893 was 2,310,713, of whom 998,431 were in Eastern Rumelia. The Bulgarians numbered 2,343,417 and the Turks, 569,733. There were 62,528 Rumanians, 53,518 Greeks, 51,770 Gypsies, 27,561 Jews (mostly Spanish-speaking), 18,299 Tartars, 6445 Armenians, and several thousand Germans, Austrians, and other foreigners. The census of Dec. 31, 1900 returned a population of 2,733,189. Since the establishment of the Bulgarian principality there has been a large exodus of Turks. All but a small fraction of the Christian inhabitants belong to the Orthodox Greek Church. The Bulgarians are classed among the Slavic peoples, their speech being a Slavic tongue, but they are to a great extent the descendants of a race belonging to the Finnic branch of the Turanian stock, the ancient Bulgarians who about a thousand years ago became merged in the Slavic population of the Balkan regions, and whose language was supplanted by that of the people whom they had conquered. The Bulgarians are, in the main, a nation of peasants. They are intelligent, industrious and distinguished for their domestic virtues and cling tenaciously to their old customs, manners, and patriarchal arrangements. There is no aristocracy among them and they are mostly proprietors of the land which they till. The constitution of Bulgaria is that of a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The legislative power is vested in a single chamber the Sobranie, elected by universal suffrage. The Orthodox Greek Church is the state church but all religions are equal before the law. Among the principal cities are Sofia (the capital), Philippopolis (the chief city of Eastern Rumelia), Rustchuk, Varne, Shkemia, Silivro, Raski-Zagra, Tatar-Pazarjik, Vidin, Plarna, Rustova, Silistria, and Turnova, the medieval capital Rustchuk, Silistria, Shumla, and Varne have figured as an almost impenetrable quadrilateral of fortresses in the wars between Russia and Turkey. Under Turkish rule the Dobruja (the peninsula between the Danube and the Black Sea) formed part of Bulgaria.

At the close of the fifth century of the Christian era the Bulgarian nation appears to have been settled on the plains of the Volga. At that time the great body of the people migrated southward to the region of the Danube, and about the year 680 we find a Bulgarian realm established S of that river in the ancient Moesia. Two centuries later the khans of the Bulgarians embraced the Christianity of Constantinople. The Bulgarian power which was a menace to Constantinople, succumbed to the attacks of the Byzantines in 1018. In 1186 however with the aid of the Wallachs the Bulgarians again made themselves independent, and a new realm was established which endured for two centuries when it was conquered by the Turks (1393-43). The Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 virtually freed Bulgaria from the Turkish yoke. In 1885 Eastern Rumelia refused to remain any longer a Turkish province and in 1886 its union with Bulgaria was practically consummated.

The fragment of the Bulgarian people which remained behind on the plains of the Volga at the time of the great southern migration existed for centuries as an independent nation. The capital of this state was Bolgar (See BOLGAR). There is a large Bulgarian population in the Turkish provinces adjoining the principality and considerable numbers of Bulgarians are to be found in Rumania, Hungary, and Russia. The race numbers in all about 4,000,000 although Bulgarian patriots claim a much larger figure. Modern Bulgarian literature is still in its infancy. There is a large storehouse of popular ballads and folk lore.

Burgos (L. Burgis) a city of Spain capital of the province of Burgos, in Old Castile on the Arlanzon and on the railway from Madrid to Bayona, 120 miles N of Madrid. It is situated in a fruitful region at an elevation of 2000 feet above the sea. Burgos has a stately appearance, with many characteristics of an old Castilian city. It is built in an irregular semicircle, portions of its old walls remaining on the side of the river which is here crossed by three fine stone bridges. Of its fine promenades the one most frequented is the Espolón. Burgos was the early capital of the rulers of Castile, and afterwards it long shared with Toledo the honor of being the royal residence. Its public buildings attest its former greatness. The most remarkable structure is the cathedral one of the finest Gothic buildings of Europe. It was commenced in 1231 but was not finished for several centuries. Burgos, with its immediate outskirts, possesses numerous other beautiful and interesting ecclesiastical edifices. The Plaza Mayor the principal of the many public squares, is surrounded by arcades. There is a triumphal arch in memory of Ferdinand Gonzales and one of the city gates is crowned by a statue of the Cid whose bones lie in the old town-hall. On an eminence stands the citadel, now in a ruined state and supplanted by modern fortifications. Burgos is an archbishop's see. It has manufactures of woollens and hats. Its trade and its fairs have greatly declined. The Peninsular War during which the possession of the town was repeatedly and heavily contested was very disastrous to it, but of late years it has increased in population. The climate of Burgos is for most of the year nearly the coldest in Spain, and the summer heat is intense. Pop. in 1897 30,856. In 1900 31,413.

Burgundy (Fr. Bourgogne, böös böen; L. Burgundia; Ger. Burgund, böös böen), one of the largest and most important of the former provinces of France, now forming the départements of Côte-d'Or, Saône-et-Loire, Yonne, part of Ain, and part of Aube. It is a region beautifully diversified by hill and valley and included in the basins of the Rhone, Seine, and Loire. The wines of Burgundy are famous. Among the towns of Burgundy are Dijon, Mâcon, Astun, Auxerre, Chalon-sur-Saône, and Beaune. Its ancient inhabitants were the Ætuli. The name of Burgundy is derived from that of a Germanic nation called in Latin Burgundi or Burgundiones, who in the fifth century established a kingdom which embraced a great part of the basin of the Rhone. Within a hundred years the Burgundians were conquered by the Franks. On the disruption of the Carolingian realm towards the close of the ninth century two Burgundian realms arose, the kingdoms of Cisjurane Burgundy (or of Provence) and Transjurane Burgundy which were soon united into the kingdom of Arles. The ancient line of dukes of Burgundy became extinct in 1561. Under the succeeding line of dukes of the house of Valois, Burgundy rose to be one of the most powerful states of Europe, the various rich states of the Netherlands being united under its sway. The male line having become extinct in 1477 on the death of Charles the Bold, his son-in-law Louis XI seized the dukedom which has since formed part of France. Burton, boasts a lagoon of Lower Egypt, in the delta of the Nile, about 5 miles E of Rosetta. Length from W to E 38 miles. It communicates with the Mediterranean by a single channel known in antiquity as the Siphnetic mouth of the Nile, and is connected with the Nile by several canals.

Bur'ma (derived from Mra me, generally pronounced byam m, the native name of the Burmese) a country of southeastern Asia formerly a kingdom known also as the kingdom of Ava, now a province of the British Indian Empire. It is bounded N by Tibet, E by the Chinese province of Yunnan, French Indo-China, and Siam, SW by the Bay of Bengal and W by the Bay of Manipal and Assam. It extends from about lat. 16° to 26° 15' N. and between lon. 92° and 104° 40' E. Its northern extremity is not far from the E end of the Himalaya Mountains, and it stretches S. finally as a narrow strip along the Bay of Bengal (which indents the coast in the Bay of Martaban) into the Malay Peninsula, covering a distance of about 1250 miles. It comprises Upper Burma, the northern half and Lower Burma, to the S. and W. of the former. Lower Burma consists of Arakan (a once-famous and powerful realm) and Tenasserim respectively in the NW and SE, both acquired by the British in 1836 and of Pegu (a small realm), lying between the other two which has been a British possession since 1853. These names designate 3 of the 4 divisions of Lower Burma one portion having been set off as the division of Irrawadi. Upper Burma (the kingdom of Burma) was conquered by the British in 1885. The area of the whole province is, in round numbers, about 175,000 sq. m. and there is an additional area of about 79,000 sq. m. included in its dependencies, known as the Shan States. Pop. in 1901 exclusive of dependencies, 9,221,000 of the dependent states, about 1,250,000.

Burma is traversed from N to S by the Irrawadi, and comprises most of the basin of that mighty river which forms a vast delta in the Pegu and Irrawadi divisions. Its principal affluent is the Kyauwin (Chindwin) from the W. The Irrawadi is navigable for steamboats as far as Bhamo about 900 miles from its mouth. It periodically lays a large strip of country under water. The eastern part of Burma is drained by the Salween flowing parallel with the Irrawadi and exceeding it in length but hardly navigable. Between the Irrawadi and the Salween is the valley of the Sittoung. The chief river of Arakan is the Kaladan. The Mekong waters the eastern borders of Burma for a comparatively short distance.

The greater part of the surface of Burma is mountainous or hilly. The general direction of the mountains, like that of the rivers, is N and S. To the W of the Irrawadi is the range known as the Arakan Yoma, with an extreme elevation of 8480 feet, between the Irrawadi and the Sittoung is the Pegu-Yoma; and between the Salween and the Sittoung is the Panung (Pang long) range. On the NW borders are the Patheingyi hills, rising to 12,500 feet, and with a northern outlying summit having an elevation of about 18,000 feet. A large portion of the country is covered with forests. The climate in the lowlands is as trying to Europeans as that of the plains of India. The rainfall in the coast-region ranges from about 100 to 200 inches. In the region of the upper Irrawadi it is about equal to that in the eastern United States. The soil is very productive, the great crop of the country being rice, which is produced in endless variety. Wheat, maize millet, and pulse are raised in the elevated regions. Tea is an important crop. Among other products are cotton, indigo, sugar-cane, sesame, and tobacco. The forests abound in teak and other trees, valuable for their wood or gum. Their almost impenetrable depths shelter vast numbers of wild animals, including tigers, leopards, bears, elephants, rhinoceroses, deer, hogs, tapirs, buffaloes, and a great variety of apes. There are countless species of birds, reptiles, and fishes. Burma is rich in minerals. Iron, copper, lead, and tin abound, and gold and silver are found in the river sands of Upper Burma. There are extensive deposits of coal in Upper Burma, and petroleum is obtained in large quantities, there being over 100 wells in one locality in that section on the Irrawaddy about lat. 20° 30' N. Burma is famed for its rubies and sapphires. Jade, marble, serpentine, and amber are also found abundantly.

Burma is inhabited mainly by four peoples of the Indo-Chinese race: the Burmese proper comprising about half of the population and dwelling mainly in the lower basin of the Irrawaddy; the Arakanese (Rakhaing) or inhabitants of Arakan; the Karens inhabiting chiefly the forest-regions of Lower Burma, large numbers of whom have been converted to Christianity; and the Shans, a migratory people occupying an elevated region about the Salween and Mekong, between the parallel of 20° and the Tropic of Cancer, and inhabiting also French China, and Siamese territory who live under their own chiefs. In addition to these nationalities there are the Telengs (or Men) in Lower Burma, the Palanggs Chins, Lushais, and others. About nine-tenths of the total population of Burma are Buddhists. The remainder are pretty nearly evenly divided between Moham medans, Hindus, spirit-worshippers, and Christians. The Burmese are a short, well-built and thick-set race, with black hair and little beard and yellow brown skin. The poorer classes dwell in houses of bamboo and palm leaves. The houses of the wealthier class are often profusely gilded. The Burmese are proficient in the making of lacquer wares, metal working, wood-carving and silk-weaving. Their chief subsistence is rice. The Burmese language is essentially monosyllabic, allied to Chinese and Tibetan and is written in rounded characters. Only about half of the people are unable to read. Instruction is in the hands of the Buddhist priests who live in monasteries. The Burmese have an extensive literature, reaching back many centuries, and numerous books are annually published in their language. The government of the old Burmese rulers which was extinguished by the British in 1885, was a pure despotism. There was no nobility but the division into social classes was carried to fantastic lengths. The Shans are a stronger and braver race than the Burmese. The exports from Burma include rice (of which larger quantities are shipped than from any other country in the world), teak, cutch (gambier), hides, petroleum, rubies, sapphires, jade, amber, lac, ivory, rhinoceros and deer horns, and coutchouc. The foreign trade is mainly in the hands of the English and Chinese, and the bulk of it passes through the port of Rangoon near the mouth of the Irrawaddy. An active trade with the Chinese provinces of Yunnan is carried on through Hkomo. Economic development has progressed rapidly under English rule, and has been accompanied by a vast increase of population. There are more than 1000 miles of railway in the country. Burma is administered by a lieutenant-governor under the viceroy of India. The seat of government is Rangoon, the largest city with a population in 1901 of 232,000. The next largest city is Mandalay the last capital of the kingdom of Burma, founded not many years before the extinction of that realm close to the former capital Amarapura, which is now in ruins. Among other considerable or noteworthy towns are Moulmein, Akyab, Bhamo, Pegu, and Twon, all in Lower Burma. Ava, previous to 1783 the capital of the kingdom of Ava, or of Burma a few miles from Mandalay, and Pagan the capital of the medieval realm of Pagan about 90 miles SW of Mandalay.

Cádiz, ká-ká-dis (Sp. pron. ká-dosh. Fr. Cádiz ká-deus' anc. Ga-dee) a city and seaport of Spain capital of a province of its own name, on the Isle of León off the SW coast of Andalusia 60 miles NW of Gibraltar and 64 miles S by W of Seville. Lat 36° 32' N. lon 0° 17' W. The Isle of León is separated from the mainland by a very narrow and tortuous channel. The town stands on a narrow tongue of land which projects about 5 miles NNW into the sea. It is almost completely surrounded by water and is strongly defended both by nature and by art. The city itself is surrounded by walls of great height and thickness, flanked by towers and bastions. Its conspicuous bay consists of an inner and an outer harbor. Cádiz, as viewed from the sea, presents a highly picturesque appearance and the views from elevated points within the city are superb. Architecturally the place is comparatively modern the conflagration of 1594 having consumed a great part of the old town. There are fine public squares and promenades. The houses are often surmounted by towers open to the sea-breezes, which are called miradores or 'lookouts'. Among the principal structures and institutions are the Torre de Vigía or Tivira, the watch-tower, old cathedral, the new cathedral of marble, the academy of fine arts, archæologi-cal museum; the church of Santa Catalina, containing one of Murillo's masterpieces, and the Hall of Arms for cannon. The lofty light-house of San Sebastián was demolished by the Spaniards at the time of the war with the United States. La Carraca, the royal dock yard, is situated at the bottom of the inner bay, about 6 miles from the city. There is a large dry-dock at the Trocadero, opposite the city, at the entrance to the inner harbor. The trade of Cádiz is large although but a shadow of what it was at the time when Spain was mistress of a great part of the New World. The chief articles exported are sherry wine, salt, olive oil, lead, and fruits are also important articles of export. The climate of the city is warm and moist, and the summer heat is often intense.

Cádiz was founded by the Phœnicians and early became a commercial town of great importance. It fell into the hands of the Carthaginians in the first Punic War, in the second Punic War it voluntarily surrendered to the Romans. Its inhabitants received the Roman franchise from Julius Cæsar. It was taken in 1596 by the Earl of Essex. In 1823 it surrendered to the French. Pop. in 1900 69,332.—Adj. and inhab. GADITANUS (Sp. GADITANO gá-de-tá-no).

Cairo, hi ro (Arab. Ka'ir of Kahira aka r of ka ha ra) the victorious capital) the capital of Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, 5 miles from the commencement of its delta. Lat. of the observatory 30° 4' 38" N. lon 31° 17' 14" E. Pop. in 1897 579,000, of whom the resident Europeans were about 22,000 and the Jews 7000. Climate healthy the heat is most in summer the temperature moderate in winter. Mean temperature of the year 72° of winter 56° of summer 85° Fahr. It never snows and very seldom rains, hot dew is abundant. The city proper is built on a slope at the western foot of one of the lowest ridges of the chain of Jebel Mokattam. Cairo is the most populous city of Egypt. It is the chief centre of Mohammedan learning, and in architecture and general appearance, in the life of its streets, and in the varied types of its inhabitants, is one of the most characteristic of Oriental cities. The newer portions are chiefly built in European style, with wide streets and boulevards, electric tramways, and elegant hotels. Separating the old or true Arabian Cairo from the new and fashionable foreign quarter of Imamliya, which now extends westward completely to the Nile, is the Bibi-el Garden which was laid out in 1870 and adjoining which is the Place de l'Opéra, with the modern opera-house. Other important buildings are located in this quarter to which conducts the Makki, the chief thoroughfare of the city. The old parts of the town have narrow and crooked streets and are ill kept and badly paved, but there are hundreds of beautiful mosques and many old residences of great elegance. Cairo is still in part surrounded by old walls, and many of the outer and inner gates are preserved. The highest part of the overlooking ridge is occupied by a citadel which contains the arsenal, mint, public offices, khedival palace, and the magnificent alabaster mosque of Mohamed Ali completed in 1807. The citadel is commanded by forts placed on the extremity of the chain of Mokattam.

Among the more notable institutions and structures of Cairo are the Mohammedan University founded in 948 and attended in 1903 by over 6000 students—the largest institution of learning in the land of Islam the famous Museum of Egyptian Antiquities originally at Bulak and recently at Ghizeh the vice-regal library containing about 40,000 volumes the Arabian Museum, and the numerous mosques, of which the Gami's Sultan Hassan the superb mosque, with its massive gateway and superb minarets (one of which is 269 feet in height) is considered to be the finest piece of Byzantine-Arabian architecture extant. The commerce of Cairo is large, the town being the great entrepôt of the central African trade by way of the Nile and the railways, several lines of which connect it with all the important points in the delta region, with Upper Egypt, and with the Sudan. A number of bridges cross the Nile at this point, the most notable of which is the Great Nile bridge, 1360 feet in length. The surroundings of Cairo have many points of interest, such as the tombs of the Mamelukes, the obelisk of Heliopolis, the pyramids of Ghizeh, the petrified forest near the Nile barrage, and Bulak, the port of the city, in the NW.

The present city was founded by the Arabs, in 973, near the site of Fostat or Old Cairo the original Arab capital. Its citadel was built by Saladin in 1176. It was the capital of the sultans of Egypt till the time of the Turkish conquest in 1617 after which it was the residence of the pashas, governors of the province. It was taken by the French in 1798, and held by them for 24 years.

California, Kal-a-for-ne-a, a state of the American Union, bordering on the Pacific, is bounded N by Oregon, E by Nevada and Arizona, S by Mexico (Lower California) and W by the Pacific Ocean its S and W limits being the parallels $32^{\circ} 28'$ and $42^{\circ} N$ lat. The Colorado River washes the southernmost portion of its E boundary, dividing it from Arizona. Area, inclusive of the upper tanning waters, 158,366 sq. m. Capital, Sacramento.

Surface, Coast Line and Waters.—A most conspicuous feature of California is its vast mountain-system. Along its eastern boundary extends the lofty Sierra Nevada, or Snowy Mountain range, averaging some 70 miles in breadth and embracing among its peaks some of the highest points in the United States. Mount Whitney E by S of Fresno with an elevation of 14,998 feet, is assumed to be the highest summit of the national domain outside of Alaska. Along the coast extends the Coast Range, of considerably less elevation which enters with the Sierra Nevada system on the S. is about lat. 35° in the Tehachapi range, and on the N in lat. $41^{\circ} 30'$ where the great volcanic cone of Shasta, 14,442 or 14,360 feet is situated. By some geographers Lassen Peak 10,437 feet, is considered to be the termination of the Sierra Nevada proper. Between these ranges lies the magnificent valley of the river Sacramento and San Joaquin renowned for its beauty and fertility and known as the Great Valley of California. It measures upward of 500 miles in length with a width generally of 40-60 miles, probably a full third of this area lies not more than 100 feet above the sea. Included in the Sierra Nevada are the deep rift or glacial-valleys, Yosemite, King's, Tuolumne, which have become world-famous for their magnificent scenery. A third range of mountains, the San Bernardino with a NW and SE trend, occupies the southern part of the state, and in the San Bernardino Mountains attains an elevation of 11,660 feet. E. and NE of this range lies the great depressed and arid region of the Mohave and Colorado Deserts, Death Valley etc., a portion of which at one time formed the course of the Colorado River. At Salton the surface is 263 feet below sea-level and contains large deposits of salt. The extreme N of the state is an elevated mountain region, densely timbered especially near the sea, with a broken surface, and with a much colder and more rainy climate than any other portion of the state possesses. The coast-line is nowhere deeply indented, except by the Monterey and San Francisco bays, the last-named affording magnificent harborage and a port of the first commercial importance. Other harbors are those of Humboldt Bay, San Pedro (prospective port of Los Angeles) and San Diego, and, of lesser importance Crescent City, Eureka, Trinidad, San Luis, Morro, Santa Cruz, and Half Moon bays. San Pablo and Suisun bays form an eastern extension of the Bay of San Francisco, and through them the navigable rivers Sacramento and San Joaquin discharge their waters. Excepting these two rivers and some of their larger tributaries, there are very few streams in the state whose navigation is at all practicable. Of lacustrine waters may be mentioned Mono, Tahoe, Honey Lake, Lower Klamath and Tulare lakes, several of which have no outlet to the sea. Tulare Lake is now mostly dry.

Climate.—Extending for more than 700 miles from N to S, California presents a very great variety of climatic conditions. The winter climate of the northern mountains is severe, and the rainfall of the NW especially in winter is very large. The climate of the section W of the Coast Mountains, especially northward, is damp, foggy and quite cold even in summer and more particularly at night. E. of these mountains the winter climate is very delightful, especially in the S. and in the great central valley but in summer the greater part of California is parched and dried, so scanty is the rainfall and so extreme the heat. But the nights are almost everywhere cool, and the dryness of the air with the constant prevalence of breezes, prevents the heat from becoming oppressive. Many parts of the southern region have a rainfall of less than 10 inches, and in the desert tracts there is practically no rain. The climate of California, as a whole, is one of the finest in the world. In the great central valley an extensive system of irrigation has been inaugurated, and has greatly extended the area of cultivable land, already large. In the S. water is very generally brought upon the cultivated lands by long ditches, and in some places artesian wells have been successfully employed. Large portions of the SE are too hot and dry for successful agriculture. Excepting some malarial tracts on the rivers, California is exempt from endemic diseases. Southern California is resorted to by invalids as a sanitarium.

Mineral Resources.—The more distinctive episode in the geological history of the state are reflected in the extensive lava-beds which occupy much of the NE, and the numerous well preserved volcanic cones which give evidence of only recently abated volcanic energy. The Archaean axis of the Sierra Nevada, with Jurassic and Triassic beds on its flanks, the Cretaceous and Tertiary Coast Range and Pacific border strip, the Tertiary and Post-Tertiary Great Valley and the ancient land of the NW and elsewhere. California has not yet passed through its seismic periods, earthquakes disturbances, sometimes with severe effect, being not exceptional. The state contains numerous hot springs. The yield of precious metals since the discovery of gold in the state, in 1848, has been enormous. Gold occurs both in placer deposits and in quartz reefs, the most productive localities being those of Jurassic age and of the comparatively recent auriferous gravels. The value of the gold-product in 1903 was $16,300,651. This slightly exceeds one-fourth of the average annual yield in the decade immediately following the discovery of the metal. Silver was mined in 1903 to the value of $498,432, and copper the mining of which has declined, $2,533,355. Other important mined minerals are iron, antimony, borax, rock-salt, sulphur and cinnabar. The mines of the last named (New Almaden Idria) producing nearly the whole quicksilver product of the United States. Tin ore exists at several points and there are also deposits of asphalt and petroleum. The output of oil in 1903 was 21,382,472 gallons. The Tertiary coal or lignite of the Monte Diablo range is of a high grade of excellence and has been extensively worked. The total output of the state's coal was, in 1899 160,715 short tons. Natural gas is found in the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys.

Natural History.—Both the flora and the fauna of the state are strongly characteristic. Among the trees may be enumerated the mammoth tree (Sequoia gigantea) a comparatively infrequent species, remarkable for the prodigious size of some of its specimens, the redwood of the NW and the coast mountains (Sequoia sempervirens) a very valuable timber tree, numerous species of pine, fir and cypress, some of which are also of gigantic dimensions, and the oak, walnut, plane, ash, maple, and many scarcely less important trees. There is, however, a deficiency of hardwood timber. Many fine flowering and evergreen shrubs are peculiar to this coast. A wild rose (Rosa californica) the introduced alfalfa or lucerne, and pin-grass (Stodum) a grassy plant, are among the most important forage-plants of California. Among the larger animals are the grizzly bear, the puma, known as the California lion, the big-horn or mountain sheep, several species of deer, fox and wolf, several sorts, including the so-called sea-lion, etc. The coast-fishes are very numerous and many of them are highly prized for food. In many of the northern streams the taking of salmon is an important industry. On some islands off the coast sea-birds' eggs are largely obtained as food. Insect pests are not wholly wanting, and in some parts grasshoppers have been very destructive at times.

Agriculture.—The soil of a large portion of California is deep rich, and very profitably cultivated, and for many years past the state has been more famous for her vast fields of the best of wheat, her great wool production, her fine fruits and the products of her generous vineyards than for the less valuable precious metals which she has produced in so lavish measure. Before the American occupation hides and other cattle-products were the chief exports, and after it became a state, agriculture was neglected until the gradual failure of small mining operations became apparent. Sheep-farming early attracted attention, and the industry soon attained great dimensions, but it is not nearly as ex-stand now as formerly. The product of washed and unwashed wool in 1899 was 13,390,906 pounds. California, in 1899, ranked first among the states of the Union in the production of barley (14,355,170 bushels) and third in the production of wheat (23,643,528 bushels, valued at $16,536,364). The cultivation of grapes, of both native American and European varieties, is very largely carried on, and wine-making is an important industry. The product in favorable seasons reaching many million gallons of wine and brandy. The total amount of fruit-brandy produced in the fiscal year 1899-1900 was 3,661,365 gallons and of fermented liquors, 753,583 barrels. Raisins, prunes, dried figs and other dried fruits are extensively prepared in various parts of California. In the S oranges, lemons, and other sub-tropical fruits are raised, while almonds, English walnuts, olives for oil and plums, citrons, pomegranates, etc. are successfully grown. The production of oranges and lemons was, in the season of 1900-01 7,150,000 boxes. The value of the canned and preserved-fruit products was, in 1900 $13,081,859. Tobacco, Indian corn, hops, peanuts, etc. are produced largely in various parts. Cotton has done well in several places. California ranks second among the states of the Union in the manufacture of boot-shoes. The value of the refined product of sugar and molasses was in 1900, $15,999,998. Silk-culture has been tried with success. Tea- and coffee-raising has been experimentally tried with favorable results. In the S honey of excellent quality is very extensively produced. Ostrich farming is carried on to some extent.

Manufactures and Commerce.—The manufacturing interests of California are of growing importance. Lumber and flour are important products. The shipments of red-wood lumber alone were, in 1900 269,601,622 feet. Wine, brandy, cigars (55,000,000 cigars) and 24,000,000 cigarettes manufactured during the year 1900; tobacco, iron and metallic wares, and machinery are among the leading manufactured articles. The fisheries are carried on chiefly from San Francisco, and considerable capital is invested. Most of the commerce of the state is carried on at San Francisco. There is a coasting trade to Puget Sound and Oregon, and a foreign trade to British Columbia, Panama, Liverpool, Australia, China, and Japan. With the Atlantic ports there is a trade in Cape Horn as well as by the Panama route and by rail. There were, in 1900 3460 miles of railway.

Consular.—California has 37 consulates, viz. Alameda, Alameda, Amador, Butte, Calaveras, Colusa, Contra Costa, Del Norte, El Dorado, Fresno, Glenn, Humboldt, Inyo, Kern, Kings, Lake, Lassen, Los Angeles, Madera, Maricopa, Merced, Mendocino, Modoc, Mono, Monterey, Placer, Nevada, Orange, Placer, Plumas, Riverside, Sacramento, San Benito, San Bernardino, San Diego, San Francisco, San Joaquin, San Luis Obispo, San Mateo, Santa Barbara, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Shasta, Sierra, Siskiyou, Solano, Sonoma, Stanislaus, Sutter, Tehama, Trinity, Tulare, Tuolumne, Yavapai, Yolo, and Yuba. The principal towns are San Francisco (pop. in 1900 342,782), Los Angeles (103,479), Oakland (84,966), Sacramento (the capital, 28,282), San Jose (21,500), San Diego (17,700), Stockton (17,546), Alameda (16,464), Berkeley (12,214), Fresno (12,410).

Education.—The school system of California has been organized on a scale proportionate to the magnitude of the natural and industrial resources of the state. In 1899 there were 253,297 children attending the public schools, 20,765 attending private schools. Among the higher educational institutions are the University of California, at Berkeley, and the Leland Stanford, Jr., University at Palo Alto, both largely endowed. They are the most important institutions of learning W of the Mississippi River. Among other collegiate institutions are the University of Southern California, at Los Angeles, with agricultural school at Orange; California School of Mechanical Arts, at San Francisco; University of the Pacific, at San Jose; and Santa Clara College at Santa Clara. There are 4 public normal schools. The famous Lick Astronomical Observatory is situated at Mount Hamilton.

Population.—The population of California in 1850 was 92,597; in 1860 379,904; in 1870 568,247; in 1880 864,694; in 1890 1,286,136; and in 1900 1,485,053, of whom 45,745 were Chinese, 10,151 Japanese (75,215 Asiatics in 1880), 11,046 negroes, and 15,577 Indians (taxed and untaxed).

Government.—The present state constitution became operative in 1879. The governor is chosen for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate of 40 members, chosen for 4 years, and a house of representatives, 80 in number, chosen for 2 years. The state has 8 representatives in the lower house of the national congress.

History.—California was the New or Upper California of the Spaniards and Mexicans, so called to distinguish it from the Californian peninsula or Lower California, which is a territory of Mexico. Its coast was visited by Jahuatl in 1543, by Drake in 1579 (he named it New Albion), and by Sebastian Vizcaino in 1602. In 1769 the Franciscans planted colonies at San Diego. In 1776 they established the mission of Dolores at San Francisco, and ere long they had numbers of these agricultural missions, which they carried on by the aid of the Indians. The country had after this a large export trade in wool and hides, and the fathers of the mission became very wealthy. After 1821, when Mexico was freed from Spanish domination Mexico and other settlers began to come in. Fremont a first exploring expedition which carried him over the Sierra Nevada in 1844, aroused an small interest in Upper California, and some thousands of Americans entered the country in consequence. In 1846, during the Mexican war Commodore Sloat and Stockton occupied the most important points along the coast, and, with aid from General S. W. Kearney and Colonel Fremont, subjected the territory to the authority of the United States. The possession was confirmed to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, Feb. 1848. In 1848 gold was discovered and the rush of adventurers to California began. They poured in from every part of the world, peopling the region with unexampled rapidity. In 1849 a state constitution was framed, and in 1850 the state was admitted to the Union. In 1869 California was brought into railway connection with the rest of the United States.

California, Gulf of, originally called the Sea of Cortez, an arm of the Pacific adjoining Lower California on the W from the states of Sonora and Sinaloa, Mexico on the E. Length about 700 miles breadth varies from about 50 to 120 miles. Its coast is irregular forming on both sides many small bays or gulfs. It contains numerous islands (Angel de la Guarda, Tiborón, Carmen, Expofita, Santo, Cerralba, etc.) and at its N extremity it receives the river Colorado. The settlements of Santa Rosalia, Mulegé, La Paz, and Guaymas are on its shores. The depth of water in the southern portion reaches 4000 feet, but decreases towards the north the shallows formed by the Colorado sediments being very extensive. The gulf which has long been noted for its pearl fishery appears to be a salted block of the earth's crust.

California Junction, a post-station of Harrison co. Iowa, 10 miles S of Sioux City.

California, Lower or Old (Sp. Baja or Baja California, bā'kāl or vā-dāl kāl-foe'nā) a territory of Mexico, on the W coast, formed of a peninsula lying from NW to SE, about 770 miles long by from 50 to 120 broad, and extending from Cape St. Lucas, its most S. point lat. 23° 52' N. lon. 109° 55' W. to lat. 32° 30' N. bounded N by the state of California, E. principally by the Gulf of California, and S and W by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 44,466 sq. m. The peninsula is traversed throughout a large or the greater part of its length by one or more chains of mountains, which are geographically and structurally continuations of the Sierra Nevada of California, and in the Cerro del Gigante or the Sierra de la Gigantes attain elevations of 4000-4500 feet. The descent on the gulf side is exceedingly abrupt, while it is generally gradual towards the west. The mountains are composed largely of granites and granitoid rocks, and carry with them or are fringed by comparatively young Tertiary deposits. Volcanic rocks are very abundant, and the soil is largely formed of decomposed lava. In the extreme south the granites and volcanic ridges take a more nearly E. and W. direction and several summits seem to exceed 5000 feet in height. The region is largely devoid of running water and except in a few points is almost wholly lacking in means of irrigation. The rainfall is a markedly deficient one, but violent showers of short duration, resulting in the sheet-flooding of the country, are not uncommon. The climate is hot and dry in the N., but is more temperate towards the S and in much of the coast region. Vegetation is largely deciduous, but there are numerous areas of luxuriant agricultural development. The more fertile spots yield maize, manioc, wheat, bean peas, and excellent roots, excellent grapes from which wine is made, oranges, lemons, limes, citrons, prunes, date plantains, pine-apples, etc. The henequen or Sisal hemp is grown in the central regions of the peninsula and in some parts of the Colorado River tract, while the arobil or Spanish moss covers a large area along the west coast. The mountain feed sheep and goats and to a small extent horses mules cattle and pigs are reared. The sea is stored with fish in incredible abundance and variety. A form of pearl oyster is obtained in the gulf and was formerly much more extensively fished than at present. The mineral resources include gold, silver, copper lead and coal, the first-named being found in rocks and in placer deposits. Mines have been extensively worked in the municipalities of La Paz, San Antonio, Santiago, Mateo, Comandante Santa Rosalia, etc. The chief towns are La Paz, the capital near the S.E. extremity of the peninsula, and the open ports of Ensenada de Todos Santos, the chief town of the northern districts San José del Cabo, and Santa Rosalia. Among the larger islands that belong to the territory, many of which have good harbors, are Corros, Carmen, Angel de la Guardia, Santa Catalina, Corralbo and San José. Lower California was discovered by Hernando de Grujalva in 1534. In 1542 the Jesuits formed establishments in it, they taught the natives the art of cultivating the ground and raised them greatly in the scale of civilization. In the reign of Philip V. more especially subsequent to 1744, the Spanish establishments in California increased and became very considerable. In a very few years the Jesuits built 16 villages in the interior of the peninsula. But in 1767 they were expelled, and the administration was committed to monks of the Dominican order who did not maintain the same career of usefulness as their predecessors. For administrative purposes the territory is now divided into two districts the district of the north and that of the south. Pop. in 1900 47,082.

Cambodia, or Kambuja (Fr. Cambodge, kām bōj) a kingdom in the SE of Asia, constituting a French protectorate and included in the general government of Indo-China. It is situated SE. of Siam, and is bounded on the E. by Annam and on the SE. by Cochinchina, and is washed on the SW. by the Gulf of Siam. It lies between lat. 16° and 14° N. and lon. 103° and 107° E. It consists in great part of the alluvial plain of the Mekong, which traverses the country from N. to S. periodically flooding vast areas. A portion of the delta of this great river is included in Cambodia. Forest-clad mountains, nowhere attaining an elevation of more than about 4000 feet, bound and enclose upon this plain on the NE. and W. From the point where the Mekong enters upon its final bend towards the E., at Phnom penh an area, of great volume in the wet season proceeds from the river in a NW. direction towards Lake Tonlé-sap (called also Siem-hoa, the Great Lake), which lies partly in Cambodia and partly in Siam. This lake, the extraordinary fluctuations in whose dimensions render it one of the most remarkable bodies of water on the globe, acts as a mighty regulating reservoir for the Mekong, sends a great volume of water into it when the level of the lake is lower than that of the river and receives a vast accession from it when the level of the river falls below that of the lake. The climate of Cambodia is rather temperate for a region situated midway between the equator and the tropic. The summer time is the rainy season, which lasts for a number of months. The productions include rice (which is the chief food of the people and is exported in large quantities), maize, beans, sugar, cotton, tobacco, indigo, pepper, cinnamon, coffee, vanilla, cardamom, gums, manioc, ramos, castor-oil, gutta-percha, and betel nuts. The forests yield valuable timber. Silk is produced and woven into fine fabrics. The fisheries of Lake Tonlé-sap constitute a vast industry and salt-fish is a leading article of export. Wild animals are abundant, including tigers, leopards, elephants, rhinoceroses, and wild cattle. Ivory and rhinoceros and buffalo-horn figures among the articles of export.

The population of Cambodia, according to the most probable estimate, does not greatly exceed 1,000,000. It is placed by some as high as 1,500,000. It consists of Cambodians, or Khmers, who constitute the bulk of the people, Chinese (between 100,000 and 150,000), Annamese (between 70,000 and 100,000) and Malays. The Khmer and other un-civilized tribes are met with in the mountain districts. The language of the Cambodians proper is akin to the Siamese and Annamese. Its alphabetic characters are borrowed from the Pali. Their religion is a kind of Buddhism inter-mixed with Brahmanic elements. Large numbers of Annamese have been converted to Catholicism. Cambodia is governed by a king, who rules with despotic sway. The capital is Phnom penh, where the authority of France is represented by a resident-in-chief. The officials are natives, but matters relating to taxes, customs, and public works are controlled by the French. The principal towns are Phnom penh, Kampot (the only seaport), Udong, Pinyul, and Siambo. The old realm of the Khmers was one of great extent and power. It was at the height of its greatness in the earlier part of the Middle Ages. Its splendor is attested by the imposing ruins of Angkor Wat (in territory now belonging to Siam) near Lake Tonlé-sap. These remains of cities, palaces, artificial lakes, and bridges show the ancient Khmers to have been a race of builders and engineers. The French protectorate dates from 1863, although it was not recognized by Siam until 1887.

The University of Cambridge founded at an uncertain period in the Middle Ages consists at present of 17 colleges. Each college is a body corporate internally governed by its own statutes and maintained by the endowments of the several founders and benefactors. Some of the college buildings are among the most interesting and venerable piles in the kingdom. As in Oxford candidates for university honors rely largely on the teaching of private tutors. Mathematics (though not to the exclusion of classical and other learning) forms an important branch of study at Cambridge and latterly biology has taken a prominent position in the general curriculum. Bacon Newton and many of the greatest divines and poets of Britain conferred lustre on this school. Among the best-known colleges of the university are Peterhouse the oldest founded in 1284 Pembroke founded in 1347, Corpus Christi (1352) King's (1440) Clara (1336) Trinity (the largest college of England, with a library of 100 000 volumes), St John's Magdalen (containing the Papyrus library) Caius, Jesus and Christ's The general library of the university contains 450 000 volumes. Cananda (kán-da) Dominion or a federal union of provinces and territories, comprising all the British possessions in North America, except Newfoundland, the West India Colonies, and British Honduras. It is bounded E. by the Atlantic Ocean, Davis Strait, and Baffin Bay, W by Alaska and the Pacific Ocean; N by the Arctic Ocean; and S. by the United States. Its divisions, partly including and partly excluding the water-areas, are as follows:

Divisions.	Area in sq. m.	Pop. in 1902
British Columbia	573,000	180,000
Manitoba	74,000	245,424
New Brunswick	28,300	331,043
Nova Scotia	21,000	455,118
Ontario	935,000	2,157,228
Prince Edward Island	1,500	104,454
Quebec	552,000	1,560,314
Territories and districts, including Alberta, Manitoba, Athabasca, Franklin (the Arctic Archipelago with Boothia and Melville peninsulas), Keewatin, Mackenzie, Saskatchewan, Ungava, and Yukon	2,500,000	220,000
Total (in round figures)	3,500,000	7,318,382

Relief of the Land.—The main portion of Canada may be physiographically divided into three divisions: 1. an eastern region extending from the Atlantic to the western border of Lake Superior and Hudson Bay (which penetrates three-fourths through the width of the mainland) and comprising the ancient rock masses with the Labrador peninsula, which have been described as the greater nucleus or protocrust of the North American continent; 2. a central division, which lies between the first and the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains and which constitutes as a great interior continental plain from the United States boundary to the Arctic waters; and 3. the region beyond this, comprised mainly in the mountain-masses of the Rocky Mountain system. Too little is known constitutionally of the islands of the Arctic Archipelago to permit of a statement of their absolute relations, but there seems to be no question that they represent a part of the continental main which has undergone disruption through subsidence. A large part of the eastern section is in the form of a swelling table-land, having an elevation of 1500-2000 feet, with much greater heights 3000-3500 feet, along the NE coast of Labrador. A range of elevations, known as the Height of Land, occupies the south central portions of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and is the water-parting between the streams that are tributary to the Hudson Bay and St. Lawrence basins respectively. The Appalachian Mountains of the United States are continued into New Brunswick and the Acadian region of Quebec, where they terminate in the promontory of Gaspé. The highest ridges of this system are found in the Buckhorn Mountains, which border the estuary of the St. Lawrence on the S. See LABRADOR, NEW BRUNSWICK and NOVA SCOTIA.

The Great Interior Plain which constitutes the second division, has but few salient reliefs, rising westward to elevations of 3000-4000 feet at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, but continuing in the main as depressed lowland with alternating steppes, prairie, and woodland features, to the Arctic Ocean. With a width in the S. of about 300 miles it occupies the position of the ancient arm of the Gulf of Mexico which, still in the Cretaceous period, divided the North American continent into an eastern and a western half. The constructing beds are still in the main horizontal or nearly so, and made up of the lacustrine deposits which were laid down in the numerous landlocked basins of brackish and fresh water which succeeded the recession of the sea. The soil over a large part of this region is marked by extreme fertility, but over large areas there is a deficiency of rainfall and the country is made too arid for profitable agriculture. The interior plain is pre-eminently a region of lakes and intercommunicating water courses some of which are tributary to the Arctic Ocean and others to Hudson Bay. A large part of the northern area is drained by the Mackenzie River.

The Rocky Mountains or Cordilleran Region is made up of the bold and comparatively recent Rocky Mountains proper and of the Coast Ranges, with intermediate lines of semi-independent ranges (Selkirk Gold Range, etc.) and of included lofty plateaus, like that of British Columbia. A large part of the western Cordillera has a strictly Alpine character with many summits rising far into eternal snow and supporting giant glaciers. Recent explorations have revealed a number of summits, in the region of the headwaters of the North Saskatchewan and Athabasca Rivers (Columbin, Bryce, Alberta, Forbes) which are assumed to be 13,000-14,000 feet in elevation. Other summits, some of which are in the main Rocky Mountains and others in the Selkirks, are Balfour 10,875 ft. Stephen 10,425 ft.

Victoria, 11,400 ft. Lefroy 11,400 ft. Goodwin, 11,000 ft.; Sir Denaid, 10,445 ft.; Dawson, 10,000 ft.; and Bonney 10,635 ft. (See ROCKY MOUNTAINS and SELKIRKS.) West of the continental border, which has largely the fjord-structure of the Scandinavian Peninsula, is a chain of ruggedly mountainous islands (Vancouver Queen Charlotte, Prince of Wales) which extend from Puget Sound nearly to the Alaskan boundary. The culminating point of all Canada is seemingly Mount Logan, about 19,000 ft., which lies close to Mt. St. Elias, in Alaska.

Rivers and Interior Waters.—The principal rivers of Canada are the St. Lawrence, flowing into the Atlantic the Saskatchewan (Nelson) to Hudson Bay, the Fraser, to Puget Sound (Pacific Ocean), and the Mackenzie, to the Arctic Ocean. The Columbia and Yukon Rivers have their sources in Canada, but the main part of their courses lies outside of the Canadian domain (See descriptions of these rivers and of the HAMILTON [Labrador] ALBERTA CHURCHILL, ATHABASCA, GREAT SLAVE, GREAT FISH etc.) Of the Great Lakes, parts of Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Superior belong to Canada (See the basins under these heads.) Other large bodied water-ways are Lakes Winnipeg, Athabasca, Great Slave, and Great Bear. See HUDSON BAY.

Climate.—The climate of Canada, except in restricted areas, is of the continental type, with well-emphasized winter and summer temperatures. The extremes of heat and cold are strongly accentuated, a maximum summer temperature of 100° in the shade being not rare occurrence in the south, while the cold in the same region not rarely reaches -45°. In the Arctic tracks of the north a minimum temperature of -70° has been observed, but even there the summer heat reaches 50° or higher. In the eastern provinces the mean annual temperature is considerably lower than that of correspondingly located places of the European coast. The winters are long and severe and snow remains on the ground continuously for months. The Pacific coast which to a certain extent receives the warming effects of the Japanese Current, enjoys a markedly mild climate, especially in its southerly parts, where long lying snow except on the mountain heights, is almost entirely unknown. The region is most luxuriantly wooded in marked contrast to the bleak heights of Labrador, a benefit which it derives in great part from the abundance of rainfall. To the condensation and precipitation of the Pacific moisture is due primarily the aridity of much of the interior tracks, the eastern mountains of the Cordillera receiving but little of the rain that falls in the west.

Vegetable and Animal Productions.—The vast extent of Canada, and the great variety of its soils and climate, cause much diversity in its natural productions. The south-eastern provinces with Quebec and Ontario, are by far the best developed and most thickly settled. They are still in large part densely timbered, and lumber with other forest products, is one of the leading articles of export. The Pacific slope is also a forest region, but its trees are almost entirely of species unknown on the Atlantic slope. The great subarctic forest, which extends almost continuously from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and follows upon the zone of deciduous trees is made up in the main of the larch and the black and white spruce, and is skirted by or includes some of the cotton wood (Populus tremuloides). North of this forest with a southern limit determined by the length and warmth of the summer and extending to the borders of the Arctic Sea, is the vast expanse of tundra or Barren Grounds, a region of desolate and partially frozen moss, grass, and lichen. The northern limit of forest-trees is found (north of Dawson) at about lat. 57°. The value of the forest products in 1902 was $35,590,000. The cultivated plants include all or nearly all those grown in the northern United States. Some regions, like Prince Edward Island, are of very marked fertility. Although the winter is longer than in the United States, and spring and autumn shorter the summer or growing season of plants, is in all the settled portions long enough for the development of most cereals including in Ontario even corn. Recent experiments made in the Yukon district, in the vicinity of Dawson (beyond the 64th parallel) have shown that even in that far northern tract, in favored locations of sunshine, barley, rye, and oats, besides various garden vegetables, cabbage, turnip, carrot, lettuce, peas, and beans, will ripen and may be profitably cultivated. Canada is destined to occupy in the near future the position of one of the great granaries of the world. The rich soil of Ontario and Manitoba yields bountiful crops of wheat, and the plains of the far West are only awaiting settlement to produce rich harvests. The dairy industry realizes a vast product. Among the native animals are the black, white, and grizzly bears, deer of several species (including the reindeer, moose, wapiti and others), the buffalo, Rocky Mountain sheep and goat, mink-ox, and pronghorn-antelope. The fur-trade has in the far north one of its principal seats. Among fur-bearing animals are the beaver, muskrat, mink, fisher, mink, ermine, otter, seal, and others. The sea-otter and fur-seal are taken, though sparingly on the Pacific coast. Hudson Bay and the Arctic waters abound in whales. The white whale occurs in the St. Lawrence and its estuary. The fisheries of the Dominion is very rich. Its fisheries are of the first importance and the catch includes cod, mackerel, herring, salmon, ling trout, halibut, and other valuable species. The total value of the fish product in 1901 was about $25,737,000 the salmon-fisheries contributing $7,321,000, and the cod fisheries $4,633,000. The number of persons employed in the fisheries is about 86,000.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral wealth of Canada is very important, the minerals of economic value, besides building-stones, being gold, copper, lead, silver, nickel, coal, lignite, graphite, asbestos and gypsum. Gold is obtained extensively from both auriferous quartz veins and placer deposits, the workings in British Columbia and in the more recently discovered Klondike region being conducted on a large and profitable scale. (See BRITISH COLUMBIA and KLONDIKE.) Coal of Carboniferous age is extensively mined in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton and in less quantity in New Brunswick. The nickel deposits of the Sudbury region, N. of Georgian Bay are among the richest in the world. Petroleum and natural gas are found in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Vast deposits of lignite or brown coal changed in some parts into true bituminous coals and anthracite, are found in the vast interior region. These lignite-bituminous coals of Cretaceous and Tertiary age are extensively developed in Vancouver and Queen Charlotte Islands, the beds in Vancouver being extensively worked. The value of the mineral products of Canada in 1902 was $64,900,000. The chief items were, gold, $20,741,000; coal, $15,339,000; nickel, $3,076,000; copper, $4,554,000; silver, $2,251,000; iron, $2,168,000; Portland cement, $1,027,000; asbestos, $1,293,000; lead, $934,000.

The manufacturing industry of Canada is principally confined to the provinces long since settled. The sawing of lumber and the manufacture of potash, flour, leather, oils, fertilizers, sugar, beer, cheese, paper, machinery and woolen and cotton goods are important interests, and since the organization of the Dominion government other manufactures have been extensively developed. Ship-building is largely carried on in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Water power is almost everywhere abundant.

Public Works and Commerce.—Canada has an admirable system of canals navigable by vessels of large tonnage and mostly constructed at public expense. By means of these, sea-going vessels can go up the St. Lawrence to the cities on the Great Lakes and the construction of minor canals (Rideau, etc.) has permitted of navigation into remote regions of the interior. The railway system of Canada can boast, in 1901, 13,294 miles of track. The main line of the Canadian Pacific R. extending from Montreal to Vancouver is 2984 miles in length. The commerce is extensive. In the tonnage of her shipping Canada stands nearly in the front line of the countries of the world. The value of the exports in 1903 was $223,650,000 of the imports, $241,215,000. Among the chief items by the list of exports were wood (about one-half to Great Britain) wood-pulp and wood manufactures, $39,537,000; cheese (mainly to Great Britain) $24,713,000; wheat, $24,567,000; gold-bearing quartz, $16,438,000; bacon, $15,455,000; cattle, $11,343,000; butter $6,955,000; coal, $5,452,000; wheat flour $4,099,000. The leading articles of import are manufactures of iron and steel, textiles and the raw material of textiles, coal, sugar and drugs and chemicals. The largest export trade is to Great Britain and the chief import trade is from the United States. More than half the Dominion's revenue is derived from customs duties.

Government and Population.—The sovereign of the British empire is represented in Canada by a governor general and the Dominion is represented in London by an agent-general. The governor-general is assisted by a privy council, or ministry of fifteen with the following titles: 1. prime minister (premier) and president of the council; 2. secretary of state; 3. minister of trade and commerce; 4. minister of justice and attorney-general; 5. minister of marine and fisheries; 6. minister of railways and canals; 7. minister of militia and defence; 8. minister of finance; 9. post-master-general; 10. minister of agriculture; 11. minister of public works; 12. minister of the interior; 13. minister of customs; 14. minister of inland revenue and one member without portfolio. The chief magistrates of the provinces are called lieutenant-governors, and are appointed by the governor-general. Each province has its own ministry and legislature. The Canadian parliament consists of a senate whose members are named by the governor general, and who hold office for life) and of a house of commons, whose members are elected by the people for a term of five years, the number of members from the respective provinces being proportioned to the population. The senate, by the terms of the constitution, consists now of 81 members, as follows: from Ontario 24; Quebec, 24; Nova Scotia, 10; New Brunswick, 10; Manitoba, 4; Prince Edward Island 4; British Columbia, 3 territories, 2. There are now (1905) 214 members of the lower house. There is no state church. The leading religious denominations in the order of their numerical strength were in 1901 as follows: Roman Catholic, Methodist, Presbyterian, Anglican, Baptist, Lutheran, Congregational. Each province has its own school laws and its own system of jurisprudence. The chief cities are Montreal (pop. in 1901 266,826) Toronto (297,971) Quebec (88,834), Ottawa, the capital (50,902) Hamilton (52,550), Winnipeg (42,336) Halifax (40,781), St. John (40,711) London (37,968) Vancouver (36,196) Victoria (20,821) Kingston (16,943). Pop. of the Dominion in 1871 3,084,039 in 1881 4,334,810 in 1891 4,833,239 in 1901 5,338,883. Nearly one-third of the inhabitants are claimed in the census as French speaking. These constitute the greater part of the population of the province of Quebec.

History.—The first important explorations in Canada were made by a Frenchman Jacques Cartier who, in 1535-36 ascended the St. Lawrence River as far as the site of Montreal. The first permanent settlement was made by the French, under Champlain at Quebec in 1608. Champlain pushed his explorations into the region of the Great Lakes. In the course of the seventeenth century the Jesuits opened up a vast territory to the French the region receiving the name of New France. Acadia (see ATLANTA and NOVA SCOTIA) was ceded by France to England in 1713. In 156-60 the British effected the conquest of Canada which was formally relinquished by France in the treaty of Paris 1763. In 1781 the provinces of Upper Canada (English-speaking Canada) and Lower Canada (French-speaking Canada) were constituted. The so-called Maritime Provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Cape Breton Island, and Prince Edward Island—continued under separate administration. In 1841 Upper and Lower Canada were united under a common government. In 1867 Canada, Nova Scotia (to which Cape Breton Island had been administratively attached), and New Brunswick united to form the Dominion of Canada. The vast regions which had been administered by the Hudson's Bay Company were acquired and annexed under the title of the Northwest Territories in 1869-70. A portion was set off as the province of Manitoba in 1870. In 1871 British Columbia entered the confederacy and Prince Edward Island followed in 1873. From the Northwest Territories have since been formed the provinces (and districts) of Kootenai, Alberta, Assiniboia, Athabasca, Saskatchewan, Yukon and Mackenzie.

Canaries, ka-ná-rá, or Canary Islands (Sp. Canarias ká-ná-rá-ls, supposed to be the Fortunate Islands—Is. Felices—Happy Islands of the ancients) an archipelago in the North Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Spain of which they constitute a province, about 60 miles from the W coast of Africa, between lat. 27° 40' and 20° 25' N and lon 13° 25' and 16° 18' W. They consist of 7 principal islands and many islets, arranged in the following order from E. to W. Lanzarote and Fuerteventura, with the islets of Graciosa, Santa Clara, Alegranza, and Lobos; Gran Canaria, Tenerife (Tenerife) Gomera, Palma, and Hierro or Ferro. Area of the whole, about 2850 sq m. Most of the islands are boldly mountainous, with rocky and abrupt coasts and consisting almost entirely of ancient and modern volcanic rocks. The surface presents a succession of mountains and plains, extinct craters and fertile valleys.

Lanzarote was actively in eruption in 1824-25, and heated waters and vapors still issue from various parts of the Pico de Teide, or Peak of Tenerife whose elevation 12,200 feet, is the greatest of any land mass rising out of the Atlantic Ocean. La Cruz, in Palma, rises to 7740 feet and Los Peñones, in Gran Canaria, to 6400 feet. There are no rivers, but numerous torrents. The tropical heat is moderated by the sea-breeze and the climate is fairly equable. Winter is almost unknown. In October, the warmest month the temperature varies from 78° to 87° and in January the coldest, it is from 60° to 66° near the sea decreasing with the elevation. The rainy season commences in November and continues till February during the dry season from April to October the weather is uniformly fine and the trade-winds blow steadily. E and SE winds are the scourge of these islands blowing over the burning plains of Africa, they carry a hot and extreme dry air which destroys vegetation and induces drought. Clouds of locusts are sometimes carried over by these winds. Fresh water is scarce, especially in the E parts of the islands. The vegetation is not less interesting than the geological formation and has in the main a south European aspect as is evidenced by the presence of the laurel oak pine cedar and chestnut. The most significant African elements of the flora are the dragon tree, of which the famous tree of Orotava was a remarkable example, and the cactus-like euphorbia. Various forms of heath grow on the mountain slopes. Most of the mammalian forms have been introduced, but even the commoner types have undergone considerable modification as a result of their isolation. The productions are cochineal, oil, grain, archil, barilla, silk, wine, raisins, tobacco, potatoes, sugar-cane and fruits and the surrounding seas abound in fish. The raising of the cochineal and the production of the manufactured article constitute a particularly important industry the value of the export from this source being in some years as much as $5,000,000-$7,000,000.

Wine was formerly one of the chief products, but a fatal disease having attacked the vines, comparatively few grapes are now raised. The goat is among the most valuable of the domestic animals. The camel and the ass are used as beasts of burden. Among birds are the vulture, bustard, pheasant, wood-pigeon, red partridge and thrush-like or canary bird. The inhabitants are of European origin mostly Spanish, but many of the people claim partial descent from the Guanches the old native race, who were of Berber stock and were a civilized people. The Canary Islands were known to the ancients under the name which they now bear which was supposed to have been derived from the number of dogs (Latin canes a dog) which were found there. It was only towards the close of the Middle Ages that the Christian peoples of Europe first set foot on them. Early in the fifteenth century Jean de Bethencourt, a Norman navigator and adventurer, conquered a great part of the archipelago. His successor transferred his rights to the kingdom of Castile. The Guanches were finally subdued about 1495. Pop in 1900 358,564. The capital of the whole archipelago is Santa Cruz de Tenerife. The largest town is Las Palmas. The initial meridian of longitude was for a long time taken by certain countries from Hierro (Ferro) which was supposed to be exactly 20° W of the meridian of Paris. Later surveys have established the fact that the position of the Ferro meridian was placed about 12 miles too far to the W.

Canterbury, kán-té-hé-e (anc. Durovernum or Darvernum; later L. Canter and Anglo-Saxon Caenwareburh) a city and a parliamentary and county borough of England, is in the territorial limits of the co. of Kent, on the Stour 53 miles ESE of London. Lat. 51° 17' N lon 1° 4' E. Its famous cathedral, erected between the eleventh and fifteenth centuries on the site of the first Christian church built in Saxon England is in the form of a double cross, with a central and two western towers, and presents a magnificent union of various styles of Gothic architecture. Its total length is 614 feet with a height of the nave of 80 ft. and of the central tower of 235 ft. The choir is the largest and one of the finest in the kingdom and the pavement of the chapel of the Holy Trinity is worn into hollows by the knees of the innumerable pilgrims who here worshipped at the shrine of Thomas à Becket. Part of the exterior of the building is embellished with numerous modern statues. Beneath the cathedral is a spacious crypt, used as a French Protestant church since the reign of Elizabeth. Attached to the edifice are cloisters, a fine chapter house, a deanery and two libraries. Among the other churches, St. Martin's, a venerable structure, and St. Dunstan's are noteworthy. Canterbury has a grammar-school founded by Henry VIII, a hospital for poor brethren founded by Archbishop Lanfranc, Jesus Hospital, founded in 1595, guild-hall and an art-gallery. A fine ancient gateway some remains of St. Augustine's Abbey of a Norman castle, and of the old Chequers Inn immortalized by Chaucer and Dame John (Donjon) an artificial mound may be specified as objects of interest. The chief business of the town is trade in hops and grain. Canterbury was formerly noted for its silk-manufactures and for its damask laces. It sends 1 member to the House of Commons. Pop in 1901, 24,899.

Canterbury existed before the Roman invasion. It was made an important military station by the Romans, and subsequently became the capital of the Saxon kingdom of Kent, under the name of Canter. The archbishopric was founded in 597. The most famous of the archbishops have been St. Augustine, the founder of the see, St. Dunstan, Stigand, Lanfranc, Anselm, Becket, Cardinal Pole, Cromer, Laud and Tillotson. The archbishop of Canterbury is primate of all England and the first peer of the realm. He wears the sovereign in Westminster Abbey and among other privileges has that of conferring degrees in divinity, law and physics.

Canton, kán-ton' (Chinese, Kwang-chow-fu or Sang-ching the provincial city) a city of China, and the great commercial emporium of the province of Kwang tung, on the left bank of the Canton or Pearl River (Cán-kiang) about 60 miles from its mouth in the China Sea. Lat. 23° 6' N lon 115° 15' E. Pop. estimated at about 900,000. Canton, with its suburbs, occupies the E bank of the river, extending inland nearly to a row of lofty heights commanding it on the N and NE between which and the city is a broken ravine to the S lies an alluvial plain formed by the delta of the river. Opposite the city is the large island of Ho-nan. Canton is enclosed by a wall of brick, on a foundation of red sandstone, 6 or 7 miles in circumference, about 10 yards high and of great thickness, and entered by 12 gates. It is unequally divided, by another wall with 4 gates, into the old and the new town. The latter, between the old town and the river is compactly built, while the old town covers a vast area and spreads northward into an endless, straggling village. In the old town are the residences of the high officials, the grand hall for the examination of candidates for literary honors, and the new mint. The new town is the business quarter. On the northern heights are several strong forts, and on some islands in the river are other forts, termed the Dutoh and the French Polly. Various detached batteries also guard the approach to the city by the river. The suburbs are nearly as large as the city itself. On the S they stretch for miles along the river-side. In the southwestern suburbs are the longs formerly the European quarter. This artificial island of Sha-mien is the modern European quarter.

The city and the suburbs are laid out and built after one fashion. The streets are narrow and crooked, varying from 2 to 16 feet but averaging 7 or 8 feet in width, each closed by gates guarded at night, and each of the trading thoroughfares appropriated to one trade. The better class of houses are mostly of brick but also of stone, with flat roofs and terraces, and the place of window-glass is commonly supplied by paper, rice, or thin shell. The residences of the wealthy inhabitants are richly furnished, those of the lower orders are ordinarily mud hovels. Upward of 120 temples are enumerated in Canton, the principal being the remarkable Buddhist temple on the island of Ho-nan. In the western part of the old city is a Mohammedan mosque, with a dome and minaret 160 feet in height. In the same section is a nine-story pagoda, dating from the beginning of the Middle Ages, and outside of the walls, on the N, is another lofty pagoda. Canton has several hospitals and many high schools and colleges. A conspicuous feature of the city is the number of halls used for guilds and associations. The French Catholic cathedral is a stately edifice. The manufactures are various and extensive, and the shops are filled with articles of Chinese workmanship. Silk weaving and the manufacture of all kinds of cloth are the leading industries. Shoemaking is extensively carried on and large numbers of persons work in wood, stone, iron and brass. Among other manufactures are those of glass and lacquer ware and there are numerous sugar-mills. The book trade is considerable.

Until 1843 all the legitimate foreign trade of China was conducted at Canton, but the more recent opening of many Chinese ports to western commerce has greatly reduced the commercial importance of the city. The value of the port's combined import and export trade was in 1903 nearly 76,000,000 halkwan taels. The chief exports are tea, raw and manufactured silk, camels, matting, palm leaf fans, fire-crackers, sugar, chinaware, canes, and preserves. The foreign trade is mainly in the hands of the English. Large vessels cannot ascend to Canton but have to unload at Whampoa, where there are extensive docks. The markets abound in all kinds of live-stock for food, including dogs, cats, owls, hawks, rats, etc., suitable only for Chinese consumers but provisions of all kinds are generally abundant and cheap. Canton is well supplied with water from reservoirs and springs. The climate is more favorable to the health of Europeans than that of most large Oriental cities within the tropics. The upper range of the mercury is about the same as in New York. It occasionally descends to about the freezing-point. The city is wholly devoid of sanitary arrangements, and perhaps represents more moral degradation and squalor than any other city of the world. It has several times been swept by pestilence.

There are no wheeled carriages in use in the streets of Canton, but their absence is amply compensated for by the mobile yamen-houses. The prodigious number of boats, largely used as dwellings, with which the river is crowded, — at times amounting to 100,000 or more, — strikes the eye with bewilderment. The inhabitants are called Tanka, or boat-people. The family-boats of the better sort are from 60 to 80 feet long and about 15 feet wide. Large numbers of poultry are reared on boats.

Canton is considered the oldest city in the S. of China. One of its earliest names, and one which is still used in its books, was Yang-shing, the city of rams. In 1841 the river defenses and the hill forts above Canton were captured by the British forces, who, however, did not enter the city a treaty having been forthwith agreed to upon the payment of $2,000,000 by the vanquished. In 1857 the French and English forces bombarded and occupied Canton. See CANAL RIVER.

Cape Breton, brit' tən or bré't' tən, a county of Nova Scotia, on the island of Cape Breton bounded on the E and E by the Atlantic Ocean. A large part of its area is covered with beds of coal. Capital Sydney. Pop. about 42,000.

Cape Breton, an island at the eastern extremity of Nova Scotia, mostly between lat. 45° 30' and 47° 5' N. and lon. 60° and 61° 30' W. It is separated from the mainland by the narrow Gut of Canso. Extreme length from north to south, 100 miles; extreme breadth 85 miles. Area, 3120 sq. m. The first settlement in Cape Breton (which was united under the same government with Nova Scotia in 1820) was made in 1713 by the French who called the island Ile Royale, and who built the strong fortress of Louisbourg. In 1745 the British colonists in America, seconded by a British fleet, captured Louisbourg. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, Cape Breton was restored to France, but in 1758 Louisbourg was again taken, and by the treaty of Paris, in 1763, Cape Breton was ceded to England. The island is very irregularly shaped and is greatly indented with bays. An inlet, called Bras d'Or entering Cape Breton on the east, renders every part of its interior accessible by water, and a ship canal, half a mile in length, from the Bras d'Or to St. Peter's Bay now bisects the island. The two divisions thus created are in striking contrast, the northern portion being high bold, and steep, while the south is low intersected by numerous inlets, and diversified with moderate elevations. The northern division at its termination in North Cape, rises to the height of 1806 feet. Bras d'Or Lake is about 50 miles in length and 30 miles in breadth; its depth of water varies from 12 to 60 fathoms and it is very secure and navigable. (See BRAS D'OR.) The climate is not so rigorous as that on the adjoining continent. Corn and other grains are raised in limited quantities. Marble, granite, limestone, slate, gypsum, salt, and coal are found, the latter in abundance and of a superior quality. The coal deposits of Cape Breton occupy not less than 500 sq. m. and are continued under the sea. The yield of the Sydney district is over 2,000,000 tons per year and the mines employ 5000 men. Short railways connect the coal-mines with the port of Sydney. There are also rich deposits of iron and copper ore. Cape Breton has long been celebrated for its fisheries, which employ about 10,000 men and yield an annual catch of about $1,500,000. The forests furnish large quantities of excellent ship-timber, and ship-building constitutes an important and lucrative industry.

Cape Breton is divided into 4 counties.—Richmond, Inverness, Victoria, and Cape Breton. Pop. in 1891 86,704, mainly of Scottish Highland descent, and including about 15,000 French Acadians and 800 Algonquin Indians in 1901 97,200. Chief town, Sydney. A headland on the east coast of the island is called Cape Breton. Lat. 45° 57' N., lon. 60° 40' W.

Cape Cameroons (or Cameroons), ká-má-ro'sh, off the W coast of equatorial Africa, is an island in the estuary of the Cameroons (Kamerun) River near lat. 4° N. lon. 9° 46' E. It was named by the Portuguese from the vast quantity of shrimps (cameroons) taken in the adjacent sea. See KAMERUN.

Cape Coast Castle, or Cape Corso, a town, and capital until 1876, of the Gold Coast colony, British west Africa, partly built on a low rocky cape. Lat. 5° 5' N. lon. 1° 15' W. There are several forts and a light-house. Most of the native houses are very mean and filthy but there are good public and other buildings. The town, which was acquired by the English from the Dutch in 1666, has a large trade in palm oil, etc. Pop. 11,614.

Cape Cod, Mass. is on the Atlantic coast and is nearly coextensive with Barnstable co. The term is usually applied to a long narrow L-shaped sandy peninsula which extends between Nantucket Sound on the E. and Cape Cod Bay on the N. having a length along its course, of about 65 miles and a general width varying from 1 to 10 miles. It contains but scanty vegetation, although having extensive cranberry bogs. Cape Cod is much frequented as a summer resort, and there are a number of attractive and quiet villages and settlements, such as Yarmouth, Barnstable, Truro, Hyannis, Harwich, Provincetown (on the extreme NW point), Chatham (in the SE.), and Woods Hole or Holi (in the SW.) all of which are connected to one another and Boston by railroad. On its extremity called Race Point, is a light, in lat. 42° 5' 40' N. lon. 70° 14' 48' W.

Cape Colony, officially called The Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, a colony of Great Britain, forming the southernmost part of the continent of Africa. It is bounded on the N. by German Southwest Africa, the Bechuanaland Protectorate, the Orange River Colony, Basutoland, and Natal. Its chief administrative divisions are Cape Colony proper (with which Griqualand West is now incorporated), East Griqualand, Pondoland (annexed in 1894), Tembuland, British Bechuanaland (incorporated with the colony in 1895), the Transkei, and Walfish Bay. Total area, 2,677 sq. m. of which 191,418 belong to Cape Colony proper. The population according to the census of 1891 exclusive of Bechuanaland and Pondoland, was 1,327,224, of which 854,482 (536,938 white, 219,544 colored) dwelt in Cape Colony proper. The total population now (1904) is estimated to exceed 2,500,000. The surface of the southern half of the country and of the coast-border consists of lofty and rugged mountains, which rise, step-like, above one another enclosing lofty plateaus and undulating plains. These mountain ridges (Langkloof, Great Ezwa, Raggerveld, Nieuwveld, Stormberg, Drakenburg) conform to and in great measure determine the trend of the coast-line, and attain elevations of from 2000 to upward of 10 000 feet, the summits of the inner ranges being as a rule, much the loftiest. The culminating points of sub-tropical South Africa, in the Drakenberg range, are on the border of Beuto Land and Natal beyond the colossal boundary Table Mountain and the Lion's Head, which rise almost directly above Cape Town, have elevations of 3550 and 1890 feet respectively. Other lofty summits are those of the Helder Mountains 4890 ft. Great Table Mountain 4220 ft. Sneeuwkop of the Cedar Mountains, 8335 ft. and Compagnie Mountain, of the Snow Mountains, assumed to be about 8000 ft. Between the second and third terraces in the E., and approximately between lat. 33° and 34° S. is the series of upland plateaus or great plains known as the Great Karroo, which retains a general elevation of about 4000 ft.—a region of marked aridity and vegetable dearth during most of the year but luxuriant in grass, flowers and pastures during the three months of rain. Almost the only important river of Cape Colony is the Orange or Gariep which forms a large part of the northern boundary and empties on the W coast, constituting the division line with the German territory (See Orange River). Of minor importance is the Great Fish River which discharges in the SE.

The climate of Cape Colony is sub-tropical with a comparatively moderate range of temperature. Along many parts of the coast the average temperature of the coldest month about 80°, varies only about 10° from that of the hottest month (76°). Snow is of frequent occurrence on the higher mountains, and has even been known at rare intervals near the coast. The dry air of the Karroo region has been considered particularly beneficial to health. The rainfall varies from about 4 inches in the interior to 21-30 inches on the coast at Durban (in Natal) the annual rainfall is 40 inches.

The flora of Cape Colony is extremely varied and interesting, with a distinct relationship in some parts to that of Australia. Among the more characteristic plants are the heaths, proteas, pelargonias, irises, lilies, and orchids. The species associated with the thorny euphorbias and aloes, is the only tree of the Karroo region. There are extensive and dense tropical growths in the east, in which palms are prominent elements in the vegetation. Wheat, oats, barley, Kaffir corn, sugar, rye and oat-hay are extensively raised. Temperate and tropical fruits (peach, apple, apricot, pear, plum, fig, orange and lemon) are largely cultivated, and there is also an important development of the vine. The fauna of the region, which formerly embraced most of the distinctive types of African animals south of the equator has suffered great diminution during the last half century. The lion, elephant, hippopotamus, buffalo and others are still met with in some parts, but the rhinoceros and giraffe appear to have entirely disappeared. Antelope, jackals, hyenas, and monkeys are still numerous; the ostrich is undergoing domestication.

The mineral wealth of the colony is very important, good serviceable coal being found in various parts and copper, lead, iron, zinc, and manganese successfully mined in several districts. The most valuable mineral resources, however, is the diamond, the exploitation of which is mainly carried on in the Kimberley district of Griqualand West. The annual product of the diamond mines has been for a number of years upward of £4,000,000. The pastoral pursuits of the colony form an important source of its revenue, the excellent wool of the Cape sheep having furnished exports in the year 1899 valued at over £2,000,000. The number of ostriches on farms is probably over 150,000. There are about 2500 miles of railway in operation in the colony.

The white population of Cape Colony is mainly of British extraction. The descendants of the Dutch, or Dutch settlers, in whom there is some admixture of French (Huguenot) blood, are known as Afrikaners. The native races are chiefly Hottentots, Bushmen, Kaffirs, Fingoes, and Bechuana, together with some 15,000 Malays.

The government of Cape Colony is vested in a governor a ministry composed of 8 members, a legislative council of 25 members, elected for 7 years and a House of Assembly of 96 members elected for 5 years. Capital Cape Town.

The Dutch began to settle in the region of the Cape of Good Hope in 1652. In 1795 the British seized the Dutch colony. They were compelled to relinquish it in 1802, but again took possession in 1806. The year 1836 witnessed the beginning of a great exodus of the Boers, who founded a republic in Natal (now taken possession of by the British) the Transvaal Republic, and the Orange Free State. The war of 1899-1902 established British sovereignty in the regions occupied by the Boers.

Cape Verde (verd' Et Cap Vert, kâp varn, -â-s green cape) the westernmost cape of Africa, on the Atlantic Ocean, between the rivers Senegal and Gambia lat. 14° 43' N. lon. 17° 34' W. Named from a group of enormous baobab-trees crowning its summit. On its point is the French town of Dakar.

Cape Verde Islands (Port Ilhas Verdes, on'yâs vâ-dâ, -â-s green islands) a possession of Portugal are situated in the Atlantic Ocean 320 miles W. of Cape Verde (coast of Africa) between lat. 14° 45' and 17° 15' N. and lon. 22° 45' and 24° 30' W. The archipelago consists of the following islands: São, Boavista, Mau, Santiago (São Thiago), Fogo, Brava, Grande, São Nicolau, Fânica, Lúria, Branco, Raso, São Vicente (St. Vincent) and Santo Antonio (Santa Antão) with several smaller islets. Area, 1450 sq. m., of which about 425 belong to the island of Santiago. They are disposed in a southern or windward and a leeward group. The former as a penal colony. The surface of the islands: in general mountainous, and some of their peaks have a considerable elevation. The volcano of Fogo is 8300 feet in height and the Sugar Loaf (Pão de Açúcar) of Santo Antonio, 8200 feet. These are the only remaining points of the island group. The construction is largely volcanic but ancient granite and gneiss point to a continental origin and some of the islands, as Maio have extensive sedimentary deposits. The soil is extremely varied but on the whole infertile. The absence of trees and the scarcity of water are the causes of frequent and severe distress. Climate very hot but tempered by the sea-breezes. The mean annual temperature is about 74° with a maximum (in September) of 92° and a minimum (in December) of 58°. A dry season covers the months from December to July. The mornings and evenings are cool and days abundant. Chief products: fruits, maize, beans, coffee, sugar, tobacco, cotton, archil, cashews, indigo, red coral, salt, and mi-ants. Cattle are extensively reared, and dried and salted provisions form a considerable article of export. Goats and pigs are abundant. Asses and mules are the beasts of burden. Fowls (guinea-fowl, partridge, quail) are abundant in most of the islands. Serpents are unknown. An indigenous mammalian fauna is almost entirely absent, but whales abound in the neighboring seas. Amber is found on all the coasts, which are frequented by turtles. The sailors are quiet and docile, but extremely indolent. The Portuguese language is corrupted into a jargon called hugue crioula. Agriculture and the preparation of salt are the chief branches of industry. Linens, pottery, ware, soap, and leather are manufactured in some of the islands. These islands, together with the Portuguese possessions on the continent of Africa near Cape Roxo, are administered by a governor. The chief activity of the islands is concentrated at São Vicente, which has an excellent harbor with deep water at Porto Grande, the capital of the island group (replacing the late capital, Porto Praya or Vila da Praia). A coaling depot and supply station for Atlantic steamers has been established here. Pop. in 1873 90,704 in 1883, 187,624. In 1900 147,424, most of whom are blacks. The islands were discovered by Cadamosto, a Portuguese navigator in 1482 previous to which time they appear to have been uninhabited.

Carpathian Mountains (Ger. Karpathen lat. 47° 10' N. a mountain-system of east-central Europe, forming part of the great Alpine uplift, and constituting the connecting arm between the Alps proper and the Balkans. They are largely constructed of fully exposed granite masses in the central Tatra group, of nuclear granitic gneiss and schists overlaid by Jurassic, Cretaceous, and Tertiary deposits, mainly sandstones. The system contains no active volcanoes, but on its inner side, facing the Hungarian lowland, it is flanked by a number of subordinate and heterogeneous mountain groups or chains, as the Mátra and the famous wine-growing heights of Tokaj Eperjes (Hegyalja) which are of volcanic origin. The Carpathians in their main contour form a vast crescentic mountain bulwark which begins at Pressburg on the Danube, encircles the greater part of the central Hungarian basin and terminates at Orsova, on the Rumanian frontier. In this sweep the mountain system has a length of nearly 600 miles varying in width from less than 10 miles to upward of 200 miles as it occurs in the Transylvanian expansion. The chief divisions of the system beginning at the W are the Little Carpathians (with elevations nowhere exceeding 3000 feet), the White Mountains, Beskids, the Central Carpathians or High Tatra (with the Gerbodor or Franz Josef Spitze, the culminating point of the entire system 8737 ft. Lomnitzer Spitze 8642 ft. Elterhaler Spitze, 8530 ft. Tatra Spitze, 8415 ft. Morsgraben Spitze, the Rigi of the Carpathians commanding a magnificent panorama, 8210 ft.) the Eastern Carpathians (comprised between the valleys of the Poprad and Bistritza) and the Transylvanian Alps the last-named forming the E. and S. boundaries of Transylvania, and having a number of summits which rival those of the High Tatra (Vagol in the Fogaras group 8347 ft. Bucecs 8230 ft. Caraiman 8195 ft. Bakozi 7997 ft. Koenigstein 7562 ft.).

The Carpathians form the water-parting between the basins of the Baltic and Black Seas. They abound in grand and rugged scenery descending with marked abruptness more particularly on their outer face (Galicia, Rumania) and presenting a number of regularly narrow parting ridges or arêtes (the Pinnacher Kamm, in the High Tatra, 7344 ft.). The mountains except on the Moldavian frontier nowhere reach or pass much beyond the snow line but fields of snow are to be found in secluded gorges and cirques at all times of the year. Evidence of past glacial action are abundant throughout the region but there are no existing glaciers in the entire system. One of the distinctive features of the Central Carpathians is the abundance of small glacial lakes or tarns (the Morsgraben, eyes of the sea; Hatzengersee), which are hidden away amidst the barren crags, in places occupying positions of 6000 ft. elevation and even (the Geiringer See near the Pinnacher Kamm, 6715 ft.).

The Carpathians are largely a region of rich vegetable growth, with magnificent woods and forests of evergreens, oaks, and beeches covering the slopes to elevations of 2000-4000 ft. with a scattering of dwarfed arborescent elements on many of the high and almost inaccessible crags. A number of wild animals, such as the wolf bear and lynx, still inhabit the inner fastnesses, and the chamois and ibex are found sparingly in some parts. The Hungarian or bearded vulture, is a part of the bird fauna. The population of the Carpathians is composed chiefly of Magyar, Slovak, German, Rumanian, and Rumanian. There are no high passes. The Carpathians, those best known being the Tatra, Beskids, and Rumanian. There are no high passes. The Carpathians, those best known being the Tatra, Beskids, and Rumanian.

On the railroad connecting Budapest with Buda, there is the narrow (or Poprad) Pass, 2630 ft.: the Verucina Pass, on the route from Munkacs to Lemberg, and the famous Rotenberg Pass, across the Southern Transylvanian Alps, 1198 ft. The Carpathians contain more mineral wealth (gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, salt, coal, etc.) than any other mountain-system of Europe. The Hungarian Ore Mountains, near Schumanna, are particularly rich. Tatra-Fured or Schumanna, in the High Tatra, and Heronies-Flirds (baths of Mohadia), not far from the frontiers of Rumania and Serbia, are celebrated and fashionable watering places.

Cartagena, kar-taj-e'na, or Carthage (Sp. pron. kar-tá-ná, see Carthago Vetus, or New Carthage) a city seat of a captain-general and great naval arsenal of Spain on a noble bay of the Mediterranean province and 27 miles SSE of Murcia. Lat. 37° 36' N. lon. 0° 58' W. Pop. in 1897 with suburbs, 86,246. In 1901, 103,343. It occupies the declivity of a hill and a small plain extending to the harbor which is, after that of Vigo, the largest of the country. It is protected from winds by surrounding heights and is strongly fortified. The city though small, is well built and has some fine promenades. There is a school of navigation. Ship-building is carried on and there are manufactures of canvas and cordage, smelting works, and export-weaving establishments. The copper, lead, zinc and iron mines of Cartagena were originally worked by the Carthaginians. The lead, iron and manganese-mines give employment to a large number of men in the neighboring La Unión. The exports include export-grains, oranges, and the various ores from the different mines. The climate is pleasantly mild, but marred at times in winter by the mistral. Mean temperature of the year 65°. The town is the seat of a bishop. Cartagena was a colony of Carthage. It was taken by Scipio in 210 B.C. at which period according to Livy it was one of the richest cities in the world. It was ruined by the Goths and its modern importance dates only from the time of Philip II.

Cartagena, or Carthage, formerly Cartagena de las Indias, a city and seaport of Colombia, capital of the department of Bolívar on a small sandy peninsula connected with the continent by an artificial neck of land. Lat. 10° 25' N. lon. 73° 34' W. On an island, commencing with the city by means of bridges, is the suburb Ysimani which is inhabited chiefly by Indians. Both the former and the latter are surrounded by walls of freestone, which are a part of the vast fortifications which were formerly thought necessary to protect the town. The bay which is landlocked and has smooth water extends from N. to S. 7 miles and affords excellent anchorage, the harbor being one of the best on the northern coast of the continent. Of the two entrances to the port—the Boca Grande, close to the town and the Boca Chica, twenty miles to the S.—the Boca Chica is now alone available for the larger craft.

The town and suburbs are well laid out. Among the public buildings are churches and convents, a general and a military hospital, a town-hall, a theatre, a circus and a college. The climate is extremely hot and insalubrious. Leprosy is common and yellow fever often makes fearful ravages. The trade of Cartagena, at one time considerable has declined very much in consequence of the rivalry of the ports of Santa Marta, Sabacilla, and Barranquilla. The restoration of communication with the Magdalena River by means of the Dique Canal has to an extent revived the importance of Cartagena, which has a fair export trade in cotton, sugar, hides, ivory, oils, tobacco, coffee, and cacao. Cartagena was the first city in this part of South America to declare (1811) independence from Spain. Pop. with suburbs, about 18,000.

Cascade Range, a long and lofty mountain-range of Oregon and Washington, extends in a N. and S. direction nearly parallel with the Pacific coast. It is continuous or coextensive with the Sierra Nevada of California, but the structural relations of these two mountain-systems have not yet been absolutely established. The Cascade Range is about 110 miles distant from the Pacific Ocean in Oregon and from 120 to 160 miles in Washington. It is largely composed of lava-masses, and the highest summits are volcanic cones, most of them active at a late geological period. The eastern face of the mountains falls off into a measurably dry or even arid region of plateau and desert on the W. the descent is into a tract of abundant rainfall and luxuriant vegetable growth. The Cascade Range, especially on its western face, is extensively covered with forests of magnificent timber including the fir and pine. The Columbia River passes through the range (near its middle) by a series of rapids and cascades at The Dalles, the turbulent waters at this point giving the name to the mountain-system which is also traversed by two of the transcontinental lines of railroad (the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern). The Cascade Tunnel, on the line of the Great Northern R. has a length of 3 miles, and is bored through at an elevation of about 3400 feet. The loftiest summits of the range, many of which rise into perpetual snow and bear glaciers of greater or less extent, are Rainier or Tacoma, 14,526 feet Adams 12,470 ft. Baker 10 827 ft. St. Helens, 9450 ft. Hood, 11,325 ft. Jefferson 10,300 ft. Pitt 9760 ft. and Scott, 9122 ft. The first four of these summits are in Washington, the remainder in Oregon. Castile, kás-tee (Sp. Castilla, kás-tee yá — a. a. castle), a former kingdom of Spain, occupying the great central tableland of the peninsula, much of which has an average elevation of about 2500 feet, and which represents two or more sedimented lacustrine basins of vast extent. This vast plateau region — with intense hot summers and rigid winters, — large stretches of which consist of treeless plains partly cultivable as arid pastures, partly sterile, is traversed or bordered by a number of mountain-ranges reaching elevations of 8000 to 9000 feet. The loftiest mountains are the Sierra de Guadarrama (Pico de Peñalara, 8169 feet) and the Sierra de Guadalupe (Pico de Almanzor, 8130 feet) and the Sierra de Guadalupe (Pico de Almanzor, 8130 feet). Castile consists of Old Castile in the N and New Castile to the E. Old Castile belongs in great part to the basin of the Duero (Douro), and New Castile to the basins of the Tago and Guadiana. Old Castile (area, 25,360 sq. m. pop. in 1971, 1,781,440) comprises the modern provinces of Avila, Burgos, Logroño, Palencia, Santander, Segovia, Soria, and Valladolid. New Castile (area, 27,550 sq. m. pop. in 1971, 1,835,114) is divided into the provinces of Ciudad Real, Cuenca, Guadalajara, Madrid, and Toledo. In the tenth century a part of this region was a county of which Burgos was the capital. Early in the eleventh century Castile was erected into a kingdom and soon united with the kingdom of Leon. The conquest of the Moorish kingdom of Toledo, in 1085, brought a great accession to the Castilian realm. New Castile, Toledo became the capital of the Castilian monarchs, Valladolid being, also at times the royal residence. The marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon with Isabella of Castile, in 1469, united the two kingdoms in 1474, and the conquest of Granada, in 1492, brought what remained of Moorish Spain under Christian rule. From the great importance of Castile as the centre of the kingdom the name of CASTILIAN is often used to indicate Spaniards in general.

Greeks, Jews, and Germans. Most of the region was annexed or subjugated by Russia between 1801 and 1878. The bulk of the Circassians, after their heroic struggle, emigrated to Turkish territory.

Caucasus (Gr. ka-kasos) a lofty range of mountains in Russia, the main chain of which stretches from the Taurus peninsula, in the Black Sea, to the peninsula of Apsheron in the Caspian, or over a linear extent of 750 miles and forms what is generally accepted by geographers to be the boundary between Europe (at its SE. corner) and Asia (the depression of the Maurych being by others considered to be the dividing line). The trunk of the system is easterly NW and SE, but lateral offshoots are given off on the northern face trending northward, while on the S. a series of ramifications unite with the mountain masses of Georgia (as a passageway to the highlands of Armenia) and constitute what is frequently designated the Little Caucasus. The two systems are separated by the depression or valley of the Kar. The main Caucasus is continued westward by the mountain-range of the Crimea, being broken by the Strait of Kerch (Yenikale) and eastward, beyond the Caspian, into the heights of the Transcaucasian Province, nearly or quite to the valley of the Mesopotam. While the absolute relationship of the system has not yet been ascertained, it is almost certain that it forms part of the great Alpine uplift, and is, perhaps, to be looked upon as the orographic extension of the Balkan Mountains.

The main Caucasus is constructed fundamentally or in its nucleus parts, of granite and ancient crystalline schists, overlaid by sedimentary limestone and sandstones of Jurassic, Cretaceous, and other Tertiary age. Some of the loftiest summits as the Elbrus and Kabak are volcanic, but there are no active volcanoes in the system although thermal springs are exceedingly abundant and earthquakes frequently destructive. The descent on the southern slopes is markedly abrupt, and much more gradual northward in the direction of the steppe-foreland of the Turk. The Caucasus is nearly equally divided by a deep cleft or defile, the Darial Pass (Kistavaya Gora), into an eastern and western section, the summits of the eastern section being considerably inferior to those of the western. At the position of this pass which marks the passage of the only railway-road across the high chain, and the military road connecting Vladikavkaz with Tiflis, the width of the mountains between the northern and southern plains is only 80 miles. The Caucasus rises far above the snow line, and many of the summits are buried beneath a heavy cap of snow and ice, and give origin to large glaciers. One of the largest of these is the Devdarak glacier descending to 7500 feet above sea-level. The Beslugi glacier in the Central Caucasus, descends to 6800 ft and others fall still lower. The height of the snow-line is, in the western section, approximately 9000 ft and in the E 12,200 ft. There are no lakes of any extent in the region and the scenery while grand and most imposing, is therefore destitute of one of the magnificent features of the Alps of Switzerland.

The climate of the Caucasus, which occupies nearly the latitudinal position of the Pyrenees, is markedly contrasted on the northern and southern faces and the vegetation of the two sides is also largely opposed, that of the N being sparse or lacking in luxuriance. Magnificent forests cloth much of the southern aspect, ranging high up the mountain slopes and in the middle reaches many of the central European fruits are cultivated in the still lower tracts are found the fig, chestnut, pomegranate, almond and mulberry. The wild animals of the region comprise the wolf, jackal, bear, fox, European beaver (in limited numbers) ibex and chamois, the leopard and tiger are also found in parts of the Asiatic side. The mineral wealth is chiefly constituted by deposits of iron, copper, manganese, lead, silver, coal, sulphur, rock-salt, and asphalt. Gold occurs sparingly. The Caucasus has been celebrated for the martial spirit of its sturdy mountaineers who have struggled heroically against their Russian conquerors. For the different races or tribes of people inhabiting the region see the preceding article, CAUCASIA (Caucasia).

The important rivers having their sources in the Caucasus are the Araks and Terek on the N and the Kar on the S. The Araks, or Araxes, delimits in part the Little Caucasus on the S. The chief summits of the main range are Elbrus (on the Russian side of the main axis), 18,470 ft. Dykh-tau 17,052 ft. Shkara, 17,938 ft. Yanga-Kosh-tau, 16,880 ft. Kabak 10,545 ft. Mishi-giaul-Gentola, 15,932 ft. Tetsaid 15,918 ft. Ubbhe 15,409 ft. and Adai-bokh 14,374 ft. The culminating point of the Little Caucasus is Aisgiz, 10,508 ft.

Celebes, thá-lá-rá (native, Yagris-Orang-Bugis, and also Tana-Bugis or Tana-Makassar) contracted into Maccassar, an island and Dutch possession in the Malay Archipelago, between Borneo on the W and the Moluccas on the E, extending from lat. 1° 50' N to 0° 02' S and from lon. 118° 45' to 125° 15' E. Area, about 72,000 sq. m.

Celebes is properly the name of the E. part only and Maccassar of the W part. The island consists mainly of four large peninsulas, stretching to the E and S and separated by three deep gulfs. Of these peninsulas, that of Menado (known also as Minahassa in its NE section) on the N., sweeps E and NE for 400 miles, with a breadth varying from 30 to 60 miles; that of Maccassar, on the SW, forms a parallelogram, 200 miles long and 40-60 miles broad. They are all formed by chains of mountains running seemingly from a common central territory which may be that of the Lutimjong Range. The great gulf separating the arms of the island are Gorontalo or Tomuni, S. of the Menado peninsula, on the NE, Tomaihi, or Tolo on the E., and Maccassar or Boni, on the S. There is little foreland, and in most places the surface rises abruptly from the sea. The mountains of the peninsula consist mainly of ancient gneisses and schists, but in the south there are sedimentary deposits of Mesozoic (and Tertiary) age, which seem to culminate in the peak of Lampo Betang (or Bonihare) thought to be over 10,000 feet in elevation. Mount Donda, in the extreme N. is credited with a nearly equal height as is likewise Korava, in the E. Most of the volcanic activity of the island is centered in the Minahassa region, where Krakatau has an elevation of 6800 ft. Sapatan of 5963 ft. and Gunung Sadara of 4400 ft. The largest river of the island is the Sadang, in the W which, however like all the other streams, is barely navigable. There are a number of lakes of which the largest is Poco, almost exactly in the centre. Labaya, in the SW communicates E with the Gulf of Boni and is the seat of an early native civilisation which sent its ramifications over the whole archipelago. The Chinrara flows from this lake, and is navigable by European vessels for some distance and by the native produce as far as the lake.

Though crossed by the equator Celebes is remarkably healthy. Its extreme heats are tempered by the sea-breezes, by rains, and by the north winds that prevail for part of the year. The east monsoon lasts from May to November and the west during the remaining months. The rainfall is very abundant, ranging from about 80 to 150 inches. The extreme temperature hardly ranges beyond 60°. The soil generally consists of a bed of vegetable mould lying on decomposing volcanic debris. Gold is found in the Menado peninsula, which is often convulsed by earthquakes and abounds in sulphur. An inferior quality of coal is found in the Menado peninsula. Copper of good quality occurs at various points, and in Maccassar tin also is mined. Precious stones are found in some of the river-beds.

The island is entirely destitute of the large carnivorous animals nor has it the elephant, rhinoceros or tapir. The fauna is a largely specialised one, and while it has distinct affinities with the faunas of both the Malayan and Australian regions, it gives evidence that the region which it characterizes is one of long isolation or perhaps even a fragment of a distinct continental area that has long since disappeared. Of the more distinctive mammalian types are a species of black tailless baboon, a small buffalo (the anous) the babirusa, a wild pig, deer the singular marsupial known as the cacom and the tarsier lemur. Reptiles are very numerous, and include the python, crocodile, and turtle. Among domesticated animals are horses, buffalo, goats, sheep, and pigs.

Dense and magnificent forests clothe the mountain-sides and in these are found the oak, teak, cedar, pine, clove and nutmeg-trees, the sago and other palms, the pepper vine, sandal wood, mango, silk-cotton tree, the badam, from which the Maccassar oil is extracted, ficus-wood, ebony, betel-nut tree, and ginger-plant. Among plants requiring cultivation are the coffee-tree, indigo, cocoa, sugar cane, mountain rice, corn, banana, the manioc root, beans and tobacco.

The chief articles of export are coffee, of a very excellent quality dammar trepang, nutmeg, copra, opium, and tobacco, most of which pass through the ports of Maccassar, Menado, Gorontalo, and Kana.

The interior of Celebes is largely inhabited by the Alfurs. The Raga constitutes the handsomest race, physically resembling the Polynesians more than the Malays.

to which latter they are far superior in point of honesty and general character. The more civilized inhabitants profess Mohammedanism, but many especially in the N have been converted to Christianity. Several independent nations inhabit Celebes. The native princes or rajahs recognize the authority of the Dutch who have had a footing in Celebes almost continuously since they expelled the Portuguese, in 1800. Women occasionally reign as queens.

In 1612 the Portuguese found but few Mohammedans and it was not until a century afterwards that Islam was generally adopted. The population is thought to number between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000. Administratively the island is divided into the two residences of Manado and Celebes.

Central America, a name applied by geographers to that part of the North American continent, or of the American land-mass generally which lies between the isthmus of Panama and that of Tehuantepec. It includes the Spanish American republics of Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, and the colony of British Honduras (Belize) with a small or greater part of the republic of Panama, and the states of Chiapas and Tabasco, as well as the peninsula of Yucatan (all Mexican) are geographically united to it. Some writers regard Mexico, as a whole, as also forming a part of Central America, by others again the term is restricted to the five republics of Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras and Costa Rica. In deed, from a geographic point of view Central America can only be regarded as a transition tract or connecting bond between two main continental areas and there is hardly more reason to consider it structurally a part of the continent of the north than of that of the south. The dominant physiographic lines show the greater part, in fact, to be more nearly Antillean (Cuban and Jamaican) in its relationship, the final continental connections across the two isthmuses having been established during a late (middle Tertiary or later) period. In its generally accepted narrower sense, Central America is an irregular mass of land lying between the Caribbean Sea on the E. and the N. and the Pacific Ocean on the SW and having the Gulf of Mexico on the NW and N. It is a mountainous region with many high plateaus of limited extent, and containing many volcanoes. A portion of the most recent Guatemalan mountains is unquestionably continued into the so-called Sierra Madre Occidental or Pacific of Mexico but the prolongation of the Andes only questionably extends beyond the narrow isthmus of Panama. The volcanoes are among the highest summits of the land, and characterizes a region of unusual destructibility; those best known are Fuego, Agua, Tajumulco (12,504 feet), Tacaná (12,534 ft.), Acatechango (12,972 ft.) and Santa María, in Guatemala, Cuscatlan and Icalco, in Salvador; Momotombo, Masaya, Ometepe, and Cosigüina, in Nicaragua (the last named, a mountain of only Vesuvian proportions, but recording 1835, one of the most catastrophic eruptions known to history) and Irasí, Posá, Tarraiba, and Chiriquí, in Costa Rica. Earthquakes are of frequent occurrence and of marked severity.

The rivers of Central America are mostly unimportant, or at least ill-adapted to navigation, being largely interrupted by rapids. Of the larger ones are the Usumacinta in the NW, the Patuca, in Honduras and the Wanks Grande, and San Juan in Nicaragua, the last being the outlet of the large Interior Lake Nicaragua. Approximately on the NW and SE limits of the region are the Cacaoscos and Chagrus rivers.

The climate is essentially tropical, hot and moist, but is materially tempered in the elevated tracts. In the low lands the mean temperature of the coolest month differs only by a few degrees from that of the warmest. There are the three usually recognized tropical zones, the terro caliente extending from sea-level to about 2000-2500 ft. characterized by growths of rubber, mahogany, coconut and cacao; the terro templado, 2000-3000 ft. the favored zone for coffee and citrus and the terro fria following above 3000 ft. and largely productive of grain. The limit of forest-growth is about 12,000 ft. The fauna of Central America is essentially Neotropical and differs little from that of South America. The mineral wealth is considerable, but it has up to this time been only indifferently developed. Gold is worked in Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and elsewhere.

The people are chiefly of the Indian and Hispano-Indian stock. Agriculture is a leading pursuit. Chief products are cacao, indigo, coffee, india-ender, mahogany, sugar, vanilla, hides, deer-skins, fruits, tortoise-shell etc. The region was conquered by the Spaniards in 1523-25. The colonies of Central America declared themselves independent of Spain in 1821. In 1823 a federal republic was constituted which was dissolved in 1839. The progress of these countries has been much hindered by frequent political revolutions. The Central American republics have the following (approximate) areas: Guatemala, 46,300 sq. m. Nicaragua, 47,800 sq. m. Honduras, 46,200 sq. m. Costa Rica, 20,900 sq. m. and Salvador 8150 sq. m. (See the names of the particular countries above enumerated.)

Central Asia, a designation applied in a broad sense to a territory comprising about one-third of the Asiatic continent and embracing most of the thinly inhabited or uninhabited portions of the Chinese Empire, together with Russian Turkestan (with Bokhara and Khiva) and the highlands of Iran (Persia and Afghanistan). The eastern half, or Central Asia within the Chinese Empire lies between the Altai Mountains on the N and the Tibetan plateau on the S and extends eastward from the Pamir plateau to the Khyang mountains and the range between which are the upper courses of the Hoang ho and the Yangtze-kiang. Its chief features are the vast Hanha steppe with the desert of Gobi and the Tien-shan and Kuen-lun mountains. The scanty streams of this great walled-in area empty into salt lakes without outlets or are absorbed into the sands. The main divisions are known as Mongolia and East Turkestan.

Cephalonidum, the ancient name of Cephalô.

Cephalonia, shên-tôo-rô-pâ (mod. Gr. Κεφαλονία, hêt-tô-nâ-shên-tôo-rô-pâ, anc. Gr. Κεφαλονία, L. Cephalonia) Cephalonia, or Cephalonia, hêt-tô-nâ-shên-tôo-rô-pâ, an island of the Mediterranean, one of the largest of the Ionian islands belonging to Greece. It is a few miles W of the mainland and about 3 miles from Ithaca, between lat. 38° 4' and 38° 20' N and lon. 20° 31' and 20° 49' E. Length 33 miles, breadth, from 5 to 13 miles. Area, about 260 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 89,178. The surface is generally mountainous. A calcareous ridge traverses the island from NW to SE, the highest summit of which Magma Soria, the ancient Anax, is about 5300 feet above the sea. The only plain in the island of any extent is in the SW near Argostoli. The coast-line is deeply marked with indentations. The bay of Argostoli extends about 7 or 8 miles inland. Nearly every available spot in the island has been brought under cultivation. Immense quantities of currants are exported. The other products are wheat, oil, wine, cotton, fax, oranges, lemons, figs, and carobs. The inhabitants are nearly all Greeks and are noted for their sea-faring qualities. The chief towns are Argostoli (the capital) and Lixouri.

Cephalonia was known anciently by various names, being called Samos in the Odyssey and Tetrapiolis by Thucydides. In 190 B.C. the island came under the Roman dominion. For centuries it was a possession of Venice. (See IONIAN ISLANDS.) Cephalonia, with some other islands, including Ithaca, forms one of the nomos of Greece, which in 1886 had a population of 82,353.

Ceram, called by the natives Serang, see Serang an is and in the Malay Archipelago the second largest of the Moluccas, lies between Bura on the W and Papan on the E, and immediately NE of Ambon. It stretches from lat. 2° 47' to 3° 30' S and from lon. 127° 37' to 136° 56' E.

Area, about 6800 sq. m. It is traversed by mountain-ranges rising from a table-land of considerable elevation and sending down innumerable streams to the sea. The summit-crest of the mountains lies generally between 6000 and 6500 feet, and culminates in Nam-a-hu, about 9000 feet in height. The island is densely covered with a luxuriant vegetation, of which the coconut and sugar-palm constitute prominent features. There is little cultivation, and the rice, tobacco, coffee, and cacao-fields are confined almost exclusively to seaboard patches. Clove and nutmeg trees grow wild, and the woods abound in magnificent forest-trees. Near the E. end, on the N. side, is the village of Waru on the bay of the same name. At Anasah on the E. coast, appears to be the only good harbor although Sawah, on the N. is frequented by wharves.

The coasts are peopled by bold and enterprising Malay fishermen and traffickers, who carry the produce of their fisheries to the Banda Islands and Singapore. The interior is peopled by the Alifan, or by a people of possibly mixed Papuan descent. The country is governed by native chiefs under Dutch supervision. The island forms part of the residency of Ambon.

The aborigines of Ceram are mostly idolaters, and the coast population is generally Mohammedan. Christian missionaries have made numerous converts along the coasts. Notwithstanding its superabundant fertility Ceram is very thinly peopled. The population is probably less than 100,000.

Cette, chên'tê, a fortified town of France, in Languedoc, department of Hérault, on a tongue of land separating the salt lagoon of Thau from the Mediterranean 17 miles SW of Montpellier. Lat. 43° 23' N. lon 3° 43' E. It is of modern origin having been founded by Colbert, the minister of Louis XIV., in 1666. Its harbor is spacious and secure, and is formed by two piers with a breakwater in front. A broad and deep canal, bordered with quays and warehouses, connects the port with the lagoon and with the Canal du Midi as well as with canals leading to the Rhone, by which means Cette carries on an extensive trade. In the volume of its sea trade it ranks next to Marseilles among the Mediterranean ports of France. Cette has also active fisheries and carries on ship-building. The importation of wine, rectification and shipping of wines, with the making of casks, constitute the leading business of the inhabitants. Cette is the residence of various consuls and has a tribunal of commerce, a school of navigation and a marine zoological station connected with the University of Montpellier. The town is a sea-side resort. Cette derives its name from Mons Cétnus, the ancient name of a low mountain, Mont St. Clair at the base of which it is built. Pop. in 1901 33,246.

Cettina, or Cettina, chên'tên-nâ, a river of Dalmatia, which rises in the Dinaric Alps and after a precipitous course of 60 miles falls into the Adriatic at Almissa. At one place it forms a water fall over 150 feet in height.

Cettinjo, or Cettinje, chên'tên-tyô, written also Cettinje, capital of the principality of Montenegro, 17 miles ENE of Cetara, in Dalmatia, with which it is connected by a costly mountain road, and about 25 miles N of the seaport of Antivari. It is situated in a narrow valley at an elevation of about 2000 feet, and consists in part of an old fortified monastery. It has an arsenal, a theatre (in which are the state library and national museum), a theological seminary, a gymnasium, and a girls' high school, supported by the Empress of Russia. The residence of the prince is a modest building. Pop. in 1893, 2920.

Cesta, chên'tê (Sp. pron chên'tê-tâ; name corrupted from the Arabic Sekka, which was evidently derived from the Roman Sepium Fractus, applied to the heights near the ancient Abyla, the site of which is close to the town), a seaport town of Africa, belonging to Spain in Morocco, opposite end 17 miles S by E of Gibraltar. Lat. (Mount Abo) 35° 54' N. lon 5° 10' W. The castle occupies the highest point (536 feet) of Mount Abo (the ancient Abyla, and one of the Pillars of Hercules, the rock of Gibraltar being the other) at the extremity of the peninsula of Almina. On the narrow isthmus at the opposite extremity is another strong citadel, and between the two is the town, which has a cathedral, several convents, a hospital, a convict establishment, and schools. Cesta has many points of resemblance to Gibraltar. It is well supplied with water and, if properly garrisoned would be all but impregnable from the sea side. It is, however, dominated by the surrounding heights, and thus loses strategic importance. It is a bishop's see, and the residence of a military governor. Cesta was a busyemporium of trade in the Middle Ages, but, although now a free port, its commercial activity has practically ceased. It was taken from the Moors by Portugal in 1415 and has belonged to Spain since 1564. Pop. in 1897 12,863.

Ceva, chên'vâ (anc. Ce'be), a town of Italy in Piedmont, 28 miles E. of Cuneo, on the Tanaro. It stands at the foot of a rock on which is a dismantled citadel. Pop. about 3000 of the commune, in 1901, 5140.

Cevedale (chên'vâ-dê-lâ) Monte, a mountain of the Eastern Alps, in the Ortler group. Height, 12,380 feet.

Cévennes, chên'sên (anc. Côben or Coben or Mons) a range of mountains in the S of France, between the Alps and the mountains of Auvergne, and lying mainly W of the Rhone. They form in great part the SE boundary of the central plateau of France, and are largely of granitic and volcanic construction. In their broadest limits they extend from the Canal du Midi, N. of Carmaux north eastward to the Côte d'Or mountains, and are divided into the South and North Cévennes, the former under the names of the Montagnes Noires Espinouse, Garrigue, and Loubère, extend over 120 miles to Mont Lozère, where the chain forms a group called Monts du Cévennes, which sends several contraforts to the N and S. The North Cévennes take the names of Monts Vivarais, Lyonnais, Beaujolais and Charolais. The Loire, Allier, Lot, Aveyron, Tarn, Hérault, Gard and other rivers have their sources in these mountains, the S portions of which contain many extinct volcanoes and present many deep fissures in the higher valleys. The highest points are Mousse, in the northern division 8755 feet and Loubère (Pue de Finies) 6680 ft. in the southern division which also contains Mont Aigoual, immediately bounding the calcareous plateau called the Causse Nerb, 5140 ft. The Cévennes served as a retreat for numerous Protestant families after the revocation of the edict of Nantes.

Cévennes, an old district of France which formed the NE part of Languedoc. Capital Mende. It was divided into Cévennes, Valley Vivarais, and Cévennes proper the last now chiefly included in the department of Gard.

Ceylon, chên'lon or chên'lon (from Sanskrit Sinhala in the writings of the Singhalese, Sinhala; Gr. and L. Tropicos; the Lanka of the old Hindu poets, the Serendib of the medieval Arab writers), an island of the Indian Ocean, forming a crown colony of Great Britain. It is separated from peninsular India by Palk Strait and the Gulf of Mannar, but is virtually joined to it by the submerged coral reef known as Adam's Bridge. The island lies between lat. 6° 35' and 9° 51' N., lon 79° 41' and 81° 05' E. Length N and S 267 miles greatest breadth 137 miles. Area, including some small coast-islands 25,333 sq. m. The surface is generally mountainous in the S. with comparatively little lowland but towards the N it expands into a great wide plain, much of which is still almost impenetrable jungle. The loftiest elevation is Pidurutalagala (or Pedro-talagala), 8598 feet the second summit is Adam's Peak, 7553 feet. Except in parts where there is a deficiency of rainfall the soil is mostly very fertile and the vegetation is luxuriant almost beyond description and the island has been described as the 'paradise garden of the earth. Woodland covers many of the mountains nearly to the summit elsewhere they are cultivated with tea, coffee, coconut, cinnamon and cinchona the great staples of the island. The coffee plantations are to-day less important than those of tea. Ceylon furnishes the chief supply of cinchona to Europe, and ranks as third among the tea-producing countries of the world. The longest river of the island is the Mahavamsa Ganga (assumed to be the Ganges of Ptolemy) which flows into the sea at Trinkemall. There are no lakes of any size, but vast reservoir basins, forming part of the irrigation processes of the present day as well as of the past.

are found in different parts of the island. The climate is tropical but the heat is tempered by the surrounding sea. The period of greatest heat is in the interval between the two monsoons, or in the months of February to May. The highest temperature of Colombo is approximately 95°, with a mean of 80°; the rainfall is nearly 99 inches. The hill-country has, during the months of December to May, a delightful climate at the sanatorium of Nawera Eliya, located at an elevation of upward of 6000 feet, the mean annual temperature is 55°.

The mineral resources of the country include precious stones—the rubies and sapphires being especially famous—gold, iron and plumbago (or graphite) the last being extensively mined. About 18,000 tons of the mineral are exported annually. Among the indigenous animals are the elephant, bear, panther, several species of deer and monkey, peacock, etc. Pearl oysters abound on the coast, and the fishery affords in some years a handsome revenue. The dominant race of people, comprising about two-thirds of the population, are the Singhalese, who speak a modern Indian dialect, an Arya tongue, with a large admixture of Dravidic elements. They are Buddhists. The Tamils, a Dravidic people, mainly adherents of Brahmanism, make up one-fourth of the population. The bulk of the remainder are Mohammedans (Moormen) chiefly of Arabic descent. Among the wild mountain tribes are the degraded Veddas. The Eurasians, descendants of Europeans and Singhalese, are known as Burghers. The government is administered by a British governor appointed by the colonial office in London, who is assisted by an executive council of 5 and a legislative council of 17 members. The principal towns are Colombo, the capital and chief seaport, Jaffna, Kandy, Peradeniya, Trincomalee, and Point de Galle. Pop. in 1891 3,068,339; in 1901 3,574,990. The number of Europeans is about 10,000 and there are about 25,000 Eurasians. The Portuguese reached Ceylon in 1505 and in 1617 they began the establishment of commercial settlements. They were driven from the island in the middle of the seventeenth century by the Dutch who occupied the coast. In 1753-55 Ceylon passed into the possession of England.

Chad, Tchad, châd, written also Tsad, a lake of central Africa, bordered by the kingdoms or territories of Bornu, Kanem, Wadai, and Nughliri, and lying mainly between lat. 12° 30' and 14° 30' N. It is in the French Military Territory of the Chad. The lake covers an area, varying according to the rainfall, of from 6000 to 30,000-40,000 sq. m. and occupies a mean height above the sea of about 830 feet—with the exception of the depression of Bodele, to the NE which seems to have at times received the surplus waters of the lake through the lagoons-arm Bahr-el Ghazal, probably the lowest point of the entire Sudan. The waters of the lake, which has no regular outlet, are fresh and shallow (8 to 30 feet), and largely overgrown with reeds and other plants. There are numerous islands or islets, especially in the SE part. For much of the contour there is no clearly-defined shore-line, the lake running out into lagoons-arms and intercommunicating channels. The chief tributaries are the Shari, in the S and the Yeu, in the W. The lake is stocked with fish, water fowl, turtles of enormous size and crocodiles and large game (lion, hippopotamus, elephant, etc.) is very plentiful in the surrounding country. Recent explorations have determined the existence of a high water connection between the Shari and Benue (Benué) river systems.

Chamonix, shā-mō-nē' or Chamonix, shā-mō-nē' a village (formerly known as La Princesse the seat of a Benedictine priory established in the twelfth century) and valley of France, in the department of Haute-Savoie 54 miles by rail (about 40 miles direct) E.S.E. of Geneva. The valley which has a length of 13 miles from N.E. to S.W. and a breadth of 1-2 miles, forms the upper part of the basin of the Arve, is noted for its magnificent scenery and is perhaps the most celebrated among all the picturesque sites of the Alps. It is bounded on the S.E. by the mass of Mont Blanc and N. by Mont Brévent and the Aiguilles Rouges, part of the range which separates Savoy from Valais. The glaciers which descend into the valley from the Mont Blanc chain—the Tour, Argentière, Bois (Mer de Glace) and Humoos—are among the grandest in the Alps. The climate of the valley is extremely rigorous in winter which lasts from October to May during which time snow usually covers the lower ground to the depth of 3 feet. The summer is short and warm. The soil is infertile, but being well cultivated, it produces a considerable supply of grain and fruits. Chamouni is a favorite tourist-resort and a starting point for tours across the Tête-Noire and Col de Balme to Martigny over the Col du Bonhomme to Courmayeur and for the ascent of Mont Blanc. Localities of special interest in the vicinity are the Montanvert, Flégère, and Mer de Glace. A station in Saumur was notified here in 1887. Elevation of the village, 3415 feet. Pop. in 1901 797. of the commune, 272.

Charleston, a port of entry, capital of a county of its own name and the largest city of South Carolina, is situated on a tongue of land between the rivers Ashley and Cooper which unite immediately below the town and form a spacious harbor communicating with the Atlantic Ocean at Sullivan's Island, 7 miles below. It is 115 miles by rail NE of Savannah and 580 miles SW of Baltimore. Lat. 33° 48' N. Lon. 79° 37' W. A sandbar extends across the mouth of the harbor affording a deep-water channel near Sullivan's Island, across the late harbor improvements, safe entry is given to vessels of 24-foot draft. The harbor is defended by Castle Pinckney and Fort Sumter and Ripley each on an island the first named 1 mile and the last 5 miles below the city and also by Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, and Johnston an James Island.

Charleston is regularly built, but retains in its architectural features (jolly piazzas, etc.) and old landmarks, many of the peculiarities of the cities of the South. It has handsome and stately residences and a wealth of gardens with profuse vegetation, the exhibition of magnolias, jessamines, camellias and azaleas being always an attractive feature of the city. The streets are bordered with live-oaks and other beautiful shade-trees and are of generous width. Legaré Street and the Battery a broad esplanade about 500 yards long are part of the most aristocratic residential quarters.

The principal public buildings are the new custom-house, the city hall, the court-house, academy of music, arsenal and the South Carolina Military Academy. At the southern extremity of the city is a small park, called the White Point Garden with beautiful live-oaks which is a popular place of promenade. The most important educational and literary institutions are the College of Charleston (non-sectarian) which was founded in 1788 and reorganized in 1837, the Medical College of South Carolina, which was founded in 1833 the Charleston Library founded in 1743 and the Military Academy above mentioned. The College of Charleston has a museum of natural history. The Avery Normal Institute is attended by about 400 colored students.

Charleston contains numerous churches (white and colored) among which St. Michael's (Episcopal) with its commanding tower and five chimneys, is the most conspicuous. The city has also many benevolent and charitable institutions, among which are the Enston Home for the aged and the Confederate Home for Widows. The Orphan Home, founded in 1792, is one of the oldest institutions of its kind in the country. Charleston is the seat of a Catholic bishop. The city has various manufactures (cotton, four carriages, haggings, textiles) extensive machine-shops, ship-yards, dry-docks etc. The preparation or manufacture of fertilizers and lime-phosphates, large deposits of which are found on the Ashley River constitutes its most important industry. The value of this industry is $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 annually.

Charleston is the chief commercial city of South Carolina, its facilities embracing a deep-water harbor and three railway lines—the Southern the Atlantic Coast Line, and Plant System,—which have termini here, and which are connected with the interior by important feeders. The chief articles of export are cotton, rice, phosphate, naval stores, and lumber. The quantity of cotton exported in 1901 was valued at $4,725,000. The city has a large whale-able trade in dry-goods, clothing, drugs, etc. The total value of the foreign exports for the year ending June 30, 1900, was $7 151 739 imports $1 124 477. Steamships ply regularly between Charleston and the Atlantic ports of the United States the Antilles, South America, and Europe. Points of interest or resort in the surroundings are the Isle of Palms, Magnolia Cemetery the Gardens of Magnolia on the Ashley, and Clarendon Park.

An English settlement was made here in 1670. In 1686-88 a company of French Huguenots, exiled for their religion, settled at this place. On June 28, 1776, a British squadron attacked the garrison on Sullivan's Island, consisting of 400 men under Colonel Moultrie, who defended the place with success. Charleston was besieged by Sir Henry Clinton from April 1, 1780 to May 12, when it was surrendered by General Lincoln. On April 12-13 1861, the South Carolinians bombarded and captured Fort Sumter. This was the beginning of the Civil War. In April 1863, a Federal fleet, commanded by Admiral Dupont, attacked the fortifications of Charleston without success. After a long siege the place was evacuated by the Confederates, Feb. 17 1865. On Aug. 31 1894, the city was visited by a disastrous earthquake, which wrecked property to the value of several millions of dollars and destroyed a number of human lives. An Interstate and West Indian Exposition was held here in 1901 and 1902. Pop. in 1800 18,711; in 1830 24,780; in 1840 29,261; in 1850 40,523; in 1860 49,984; in 1890 55,907; in 1900 54,955.

Cherbourg, Fr. gran. shain booz (L. Cherbourg; see Cherbourg?) a fortified seaport and great naval station of France, situated in the department of Manche (Normandy), on the English Channel, at the N. end of the peninsula of Cotentin, 53 miles W. by N. of Havre. Lat. 49° 40' N. lon 1° 30' W. It consists of the old town, built of which are rocky and wooded heights, and of the new or military town to the NW. Among the principal buildings are the old church of St. Trinité, recently restored, the town-hall, which contains a gallery of paintings and a museum, and a new hospital. In front of the town-hall stands an equestrian statue of Napoleon I. and the public park is adorned with a monument to the painter Millet. The engineering works in connection with the port of Cherbourg completed about half a century ago represent the most stupendous achievement of hydraulic engineering. The commercial and naval ports are quite distinct from each other. The commercial port consists of a harbor and a basin about 1300 feet long and 400 feet wide. The channel from the harbor to the sea is about 3000 feet long and 164 feet wide and is lined by a granite quay with parapets. The military port, which can accommodate about 45 vessels of war of the largest class, has three basins excavated from the solid slate rock which forms the foundation of the entire yard, in places to a depth of 65 feet.

The great work for which Cherbourg is celebrated is the digue or breakwater stretching across the roadstead which though protected on three sides by the land, was open to the heavy seas from the N. The digue was commenced under Louis XIV. continued by Napoleon I. and finished in 1858. It is 2½ miles from the harbor in water varying from 42 to 62 feet in depth and has a length of 4136 yards. Its cost was 67 900 000 francs. The forts on this breakwater on the island of Païe, to the E. and at other points render Cherbourg a well nigh impregnable fortress. The dock yards, arsenals, machine-shops, and forges of the military port are on a gigantic scale.

The town has become a frequented sea-side resort. It exports large quantities of farm- and poultry produce to England. Pop. in 1901 42,018.

Chesapeake Bay, a large and important bay in Maryland and Virginia, extends from the mouth of the Susquehanna River southward to Hampton Roads and communicates with the Atlantic Ocean by a wide channel between Cape Charles and Cape Henry. It is about 200 miles long and varies in width from 4 to nearly 40 miles, dividing Maryland into two parts, called the Eastern and the Western Shore, and having also upon its eastern shore the co. of Accomac and Northampton in Virginia. The land on each side of the bay is deeply indented by numerous inlets or estuaries through which the Potomac, Patuxent, Rappahannock, York James, Choptank Nantuxet, and other rivers enter the bay. The water is sufficiently deep to permit the largest vessels to ascend almost to the mouth of the Susquehanna. Baltimore is on an estuary (Patuxent River) which is virtually a part of the Chesapeake, and derives from it great commercial advantages. Chester, a county of England. See CHESTER.

Chester (anc. Deva or Deva Castrum) a city parliamentary and county borough of England, within the territorial limits of Cheshire is situated on a rocky eminence nearly encompassed by the river Dee 20 miles from the Irish Sea and 16 miles SSE of Liverpool. It is one of the oldest cities of England and still retains many vestiges of the Roman and Norman periods. The picturesque and quaint aspect of Chester is due in a large measure to its ancient walls of sandstone probably reared on a Roman substratum which are still intact and surround the place for its entire circuit of two miles, forming promenades which command beautiful views. The town is divided into four districts by four streets, which radiate at right angles from the Cross and terminate in four gates. The streets hewn out of the rock by the Romans at a depth of from 4 to 19 feet exhibit a most interesting feature of the town in what are known as the Bows. These Bows are continuous elevated galleries running, in three of the streets, along either side of the street, the extension of the first floor of the houses forming a sort of gallery over the ground floor. The impression of quaintness and age which Chester creates is heightened by its old timbered houses of the seventeenth century and by the recent ones which are built in imitation of these.

The Grosvenor Bridge, a splendid single span of stone, 204 feet in length, crosses the Dee and there is besides an interesting old bridge of seven arches. Outside of the ecclesiastical edifices the town has few public buildings of note. Chester Cathedral a magnificent but irregular Norman-Gothic pile, several churches dating from the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and a portion of a castle founded by William the Conqueror are the most interesting structures. Among buildings of recent construction the great railway station deserves mention. The duke of Westminster whose magnificent residence, Eaton Hall, is at a short distance from Chester presented to the town, in 1867 the New Grosvenor Park and the Roddes, a level tract, used as a race-course.

Chester was at one time a busy seaport, but the silting of the channel of the Dee deprived it of its natural advantages. It has still a considerable coasting trade. Chester cheese is celebrated. The town returns 1 member to parliament. The Romans had an important station here. Pop. of the county borough in 1901 38 809

Chicago, shik'ka go or shik'ka go a city port of entry and capital of Cook co., Ill., situated near the S. extremity of Lake Michigan, on its W. shore, about 700 miles to a direct line W by N of New York. Lat. (main business quarter) 41° 53' N. lon. 87° 34' W. Elevation above the sea, 600 feet. The narrow Chicago River connecting with Lake Michigan with its North and South Branches, divides the city into the North West, and South Sides. The municipal district extends along the lake for about 26 miles. Chicago is the second city in the United States in population, and likewise the second in the volume of its trade and in commercial activity. It is the centre of the railway system of the United States, and its position gives it a great share of the prodigious commerce by way of the Great Lakes. With the progress of canal construction, it is destined in the near future to be connected by lines of ocean-steamers with every quarter of the globe.

The city which covers an area of nearly 190 sq m. rises but little above the level of the lake, and is laid out with the monotony generally that distinguishes the larger American cities generally. The business streets of first importance are State, Clark, Madison, Dearborn and La Salle, and Wabash Avenue. In the grandeur and cohesiveness of its business structures, Chicago is surpassed by New York only among the cities of the world. Among the more prominent buildings and institutions are the city-hall and county court-house, a twin structure erected at a cost of nearly $5,000,000 the board of trade, with a tower 322 feet in height the chamber of commerce, the Auditorium, containing a theatre having a seating capacity of 5000 Chicago Art Institute Chicago Historical Society with valuable collections of books and of relics pertaining largely to the Northwest Chicago Academy of Sciences Masonic Temple, Chicago Public Library Newberry Library and the Field Columbian Museum with one of the most promising collections of natural history and archaeology in the United States. The University of Chicago which was opened in 1892 as a successor to an earlier university (founded in 1857) is one of the leading institutions of learning in the country and has full faculties of arts, science, commerce and politics and philosophy and a library of about 300,000 volumes. The number of enrolled students is about 3000 or, with auditors 4000. Connected with the institution is the Yerkes Observatory located on Williams Bay Wis. Chicago is also the seat (in part) of the Northwestern University with schools or colleges of medicine, law, dentistry, pharmacy, theology and liberal arts, the last two located at Evanston of the Rush Medical College, College of Physicians and Surgeons Chicago College of Pharmacy and the Armour Institute of Technology (founded in 1892). The public libraries of the city (Chicago Public Library Newberry and John Crerar Libraries) are on a magnificent scale, the first two containing together more than 600,000 volumes. Chicago is generally provided with parks (Lincoln Washington Jackson, Garfield Humboldt Lake Front, the last named adjoining the business section) which cover collectively upward of 2500 acres. These, with their connecting boulevards offer 60 miles of driveway within the city limits. Among the finest boulevards and residence streets are the Lake Shore Drive, Michigan Grand and Dearborn Boulevards. No city in the world presents such a perfected system of rail intercommunication. The method of water-supply by means of a tunnel running 4 miles into the lake is a triumph of hydraulic engineering which is now eclipsed by the great drainage canal (at the same time a ship-canal) 28 miles long which conveys the sewage of the city through the Des Plaines River into the Illinois River. This canal, which was begun in 1892 and formally opened in Jan. 1900 terminates at Lockport, and will give passage to vessels of 22 feet draught. The cost of construction was $33,000,000.

The industries and manufactures of Chicago are as varied as they are extensive. The city is the greatest grain market and also the largest lumber mart in the world, while in the industry of slaughtering cattle and hogs and preparing the meat products ("packing" and "canning") for the market it occupies a unique position. The extensive Union Stock yards, which cover an area of about 400 acres, have accommodation for 75,000 head of cattle, 300,000 hogs, 80,000 sheep and 6000 horses. The receipts in the stock-yards were in 1900 8,150,000 hogs, 2,500,000 sheep and 2,700,000 cattle, besides about 100,000 horses, having a total valuation approximating $200,000,000. The number of men employed in the packing and canning-industry is upward of 20,000. The receipts of grain for the year 1900 were 314,000,000 bushels, and of lumber 1,678,000,000 feet, the exports of the latter being 770,000,000 feet. Among the more important general manufactures of the city may be mentioned those of railway cars, locomotives, agricultural implements, mining-appliances, clothing, electrical apparobes, lumber products, furniture, pianos, organs, bicycles, leather, cigars, chemicals, beer, spirits, and flour. The steel and iron industry is conducted on an enormous scale, and the city has some of the largest rolling-mills in the world. The value of the iron and steel product, including castings, was in 1900 $54,000,000 the product of the four dras and machine-shops, $44,500,000. Chicago is also one of the leading publishing-centres of the United States and is the active jobbing-centre of the book trade. Upward of 500 journals are published here, of which number some 25 are dailies.

The number of vessels that entered the port in 1900 was nearly 6000 with an aggregate tonnage of over 7,000,000 making Chicago in this respect one of the foremost places in the world. The imports of merchandise from foreign countries during the fiscal year 1899-1900 aggregated in value $10,300,730, and the exports, $5,311,770. The clearance of vessels engaged in the foreign trade were sailing vessels, 109, steam-vessels, 199.

The climate of Chicago, while generally healthy, is not altogether agreeable, owing to the high winds which prevail more particularly during the winter months. The mean temperature of the year is about 49° of January 28.5° and of July, 73°. The annual rainfall is 37½ inches.

The name 'Chicago' is of Indian origin, signifying either a wild onion, a king or deity, or a skunk. It was also applied to a valiant line of chiefs and to the voice of the Great Manitou. The first Europeans known to have visited the site were two French fur-traders in 1654. In 1673 the two explorers Joliet and Father Marquette passed down the Chicago River to the lake, and for a time this region was in the possession of France. The name Fort Chicago appears on a map published in Quebec as early as 1696. In 1795 the Indian residents ceded to the United States an area of 8 miles square at the mouth of the river on which, in 1804, Fort Dearborn was erected. The fort was burned by the Indians in 1812, after the garrison and the few white settlers had fallen into the hands of the Indians. Four years later the fort was rebuilt. Two years afterwards the surrounding territory was organized into the state of Illinois. In 1830 when there were about a dozen houses, a town was laid out. In 1831 the county of Cook was created with Chicago as the county seat. The place was incorporated as a town in 1837. In the same year the first newspaper known as the Chicago Democrat was established. Chicago was chartered as a city in 1837 with a population of 4170. This was followed with 4853 in 1840, 29,983 in 1850, 112,175 in 1860, 299,977 in 1870, 603,186 in 1880, and 1,609,850 in 1890. The population in 1900 was 1,696,370 of whom about 475,000 were Germans, 470,000 Americans, 240,000 Irish, 105,000 Swedes, 95,000 Bohemians, 90,000 Poles, 40,000 Norwegians, 40,000 English, 35,000 Russians, 30,000 French, and 20,000 Italians.

The greatest event in the history of Chicago was the Great Fire as it is termed which broke out on the evening of Oct. 8, 1871. The total area of the land burned over was 2190 acres. Nearly 18,000 buildings were consumed. The lives lost were 200 and the grand total of values destroyed is estimated at $200,000,000. The World's Columbian Exposition was held in the city in 1893, on a site in Jackson Park.

Chile, or Chili, shee' (Sp. Chile shee' lá) a republic of South America, extending as a narrow strip of land between the Andes on the E and the Pacific on the W and southward from the boundary of Peru, in about lat. 17° 30' S. to Cape Horn thus covering nearly 30 degrees of latitude, or 2700 miles. Its political boundaries on the E are Bolivia (in the N) and the Argentine Republic (with Patagonia), the latter retaining possession of the eastern half of the island of Tierra del Fuego. The Strait of Magellan is considered neutral territory. The Andean boundary line, which in a general way coincides with the crest or water-parting of the main mountain-system, although shaped by various conventions, has not yet been definitely located in all parts. The width of the country while it expands, with its islands, to the extreme of about 250 miles hardly exceeds on an average 100 miles. The republic is divided into 23 provinces and 1 territory (Magallanes) and has an area of about 200,000 sq. m. and a population (in 1900) of about 3,500,000 including some 450,000 not enumerated in the census returns. The populations were as follows:

Provinces and Territory	Pop. in 1900	Provinces and Territory	Pop. in 1900
Antofagasta	122,400	Llanquihue	31,406
Antofagasta	40,000	Magallanes (Territory)	6,019
Arauco	60,000	Maluco	112,430
Atacama	50,707	Maule	137,502
Bio-Bio	104,543	Nuble	174,942
Cara's	25,100	O'Higgins	55,200
Chilo	91,100	Punta Arenas	433,686
Cochagua	178,710	Tacna	90,031
Concepcion	212,294	Talca	148,002
Copiapó	164,001	Tarapacá	60,700
Curico	118,012	Valdivia	70,512
Linares	115,905	Valparaiso	361,132

Face of the Country etc.—Chile is properly divisible into three regions. 1 The region N. of Copiapó comprised mainly in the provinces of Tarapacá and Antofagasta, with steppe-like plains and pampas, rising progressively to the foot of the main mountains. In this region in some parts of which there is no rainfall for years at a time and where desert conditions largely prevail there are numerous salines (salinas) and nitrate basins (salitreros) which together with other minerals contribute for tonnage to the wealth of a territory which is barred from the benefits of agricultural possibilities. The so-called Atacama desert, with its enormous mineral wealth, lies in this tract. 2 The second or central region of Chile is traversed from N. to S. by the ranges of the Andes, of which there are, as in other parts of the system two main parallel chains, which enclose between them the table-land that is commonly described as the central valley of Chile. The southern portion of this included highland is of a lacustrine nature, and E. and S. of Valdivia a number of large lakes still remain which physiographically connect with the third region—that of the fringed and submerged Andes, of which the distinguishing features are the large number of coast-islands, with their intercommunicating waters, and the deep fjords which enter the continental main. This formation which includes Chiloe the Chonos, Taitao, Campana, and Queen Adelphi archipelagos etc. continues to the extremity of the continent.

Among the loftiest summits of the Chilean Andes the greater number of which are extinct and dismantled volcanoes, are Tupungato (extinct like its superior, Aconcagua) 23,000 feet; Cerro del Morado, 23,000 ft. Llanquihue, 21,500 ft. Antofalla, 20,000 ft. Ampa de Copiapó, 19,700 ft.; Juncal, 20,000 ft. Parícuta, 20,000 ft., and Pomerape (with smoking), 20,000 ft. Aconcagua, whose base is partly in Chile, has its summit (23,000 ft.) in the Argentine Republic. Among the highest peaks of Fuenja are Sarcodonta 8910 ft., and Darwin 6800 ft. The Chilean Andes are more heavily clad in snow than any other part of the system, and they radiate out numerous glaciers, especially in the south, where some descend into the Pacific floods. There are a number of lofty passes, as the Andes, 11,970 ft.; Los Patos, a few miles to the N of Aconcagua, 11,700 ft.; and the famous Cumbre, or Uspallata Pass, a few miles SW of Aconcagua 12,795 ft.—the gateway of the Argentine-Chilean transcontinental railway. The mountains, like the great valley fall off in height southward.

The rivers of Chile are directed in the main westward across the country falling off rapidly from the Andean heights. There are none of any great size, the Bio-Bio with a length of perhaps 250 miles, being the largest and longest. Other streams are the Maipo, Imperial, and Valdivia.

Climate and Productions—From the tropical heat of the northern region of Atacama to the perpetual winter of Cape Horn, every variety of climate is found in Chile. In the N the climate of the coast is subtropical but in the interior the mountains tower far above the snow line, and from them flow torrents which to some extent compensate for the lack of rain. Southward of Chiloe the climate is excessively wet. The territory of Magallanes is too wet for the growth of cereals, but root-crops and garden products thrive to perfection. Chiloe, Llanquihue, Valdivia, and Arica have a climate that has been compared with that of Great Britain. That of the central valley is markedly healthy and pleasant, the mercury rarely rising above 77°-78° or falling below the freezing-point. In the northern provinces there may be no rainfall for 30 years or more, and even at Copiapo the annual rainfall is sometimes restricted to a single day. On the other hand, at Valdivia, nearly 100 inches have been known to fall in 150 days and at Cape Horn where the number of rainy days in the year is about 300 100 inches have been noted in 40 days.

The crops are those of the temperate zone generally. In the N agriculture is only practised where irrigation can be effected. Live-stock and alfalfa are exported from the north; potatoes, flax, rye, barley, honey wax, jerked beef, leather, hides, fruit, flour, walnuts, and wheat from the central part and timber, potatoes, apples, etc. from the southern provinces. Of the native trees a large proportion is made up of the evergreens. The Freycinetia Patagonica, called cedar is the principal timber tree. Other noteworthy trees are the Araucarian pine, the Fagus obliqua, a beech, here misnamed oak (roble) and the quillaya, whose detergent bark is not unknown in commerce. The European poplar and the Australian blue-gum (Eucalyptus) have been acclimated.

The animals include the puma, vicious guanaco chibchilla (at elevations of 12,000 feet and over); sea-otter and several species of deer including the diminutive pudu, with many species of birds among which are the condor, American ostrich, cape pigeon, parrots and albatross. Chile has no venomous reptiles and the streams are almost destitute of fishes.

The mineral wealth is very great. Gold is obtained chiefly from river-sands (pascos) but the yield is not very large, amounting to 3000-4000 lbs. per year. The silver product is considerably larger. Copper-ores are widely distributed and they constitute, after the nitrate, the most important mineral resource of the country. The output of this ore amounted in 1902 to 49,259 metric tons, or 11,500 metric tons of the reduced metal. Cobalt and nickel are also mined. Zinc, iron, bismuth, mercury, alabaster and lapis lazuli are found. Sulfur or onyx nitre (sodium nitrate) and crude borax are abundant in the extreme north. The nitrate deposits are estimated to cover an area of 275,000 acres and yield an annual product of about 1,300,000 tons, the workings giving employment in 1902 to 24,538 hands. Southward from lat 36° 50' S coal is very abundant. It is largely worked being a good steam-coal and very serviceable in smelting works, though classed as a Tertiary lignite. Copper-ores are largely shipped to Europe, but copper and silver also are now extensively reduced in Chile.

Manufactures (other than the smelting of ores and the production of glass, leather, soap, sugar and saltpetre) are not extensive, but have received considerable attention of late. Agriculture and stock raising are the leading pursuits the annual production of the cereals being about 30,000,000 bushels (wheat 26,000,000). There were in 1902 nearly 3000 miles of railway in operation, with many new lines projected.

The population of Chile consists chiefly of whites of Spanish descent, Indians and mestizos. The pure Spaniards constitute a minority. Many of the inhabitants represent a mixture of European, Indian, and Negro blood. The Spanish language everywhere prevails. The Roman Catholic church is sustained at public cost, but other churches are tolerated. There is a system of public schools, with a national or state university at Santiago. Daily and weekly newspapers are published in almost every large town. Chile is one of the most prosperous of the South American countries, and is among the most favored in natural resources. In energy and enterprise the Chileans surpass the other peoples of Spanish South America. In the southern-central provinces there are many Germans, French, English, and some American colonists. A most interesting people of southern Chile proper are the Indians of Araucania. (See ARAUCANIA.) Still further south are the Fuegians.

The government of Chile is administered by a president who is elected for a term of five years, assisted by a cabinet or ministry (constructed of seven departments, under 6 ministers) and a council of state composed of 11 members, 5 of whom are nominated by the president. The legislative power is vested in a National Congress, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives. The members of the Senate are elected by the provinces, the election being direct, and serve six years. The members of the lower house are elected for a term of three years.

Chile rose against the Spanish rule in 1810 and achieved her liberation by the victory at Maipo in 1818. The war waged with Peru and Bolivia in 1879-83 resulted in the acquisition of the Bolivian coastland and the northern extremity of Peru. The chief cities are Santiago, the capital with a population (Dec 31 1901) of 290,645; Valparaiso, 132,941; Concepcion, 40,227; Talca, 39,110; Iquique, Chile, Valdivia, Copiapo and Coquimbo.

Chilinito, che-l-i-see-to, a mining town of the Argentine Republic, province and 40 miles W by N of La Rioja, in the Famatina valley. It is connected by railroad with Cordoba.

Chiles, a post-village of Miami co. Kan. on the Missouri Pacific R. Pop. about 100.

telous. Its banks are studded with hamlets, whose inhabitants are employed in extensive salt-works.

Chikot, or Chikot, a post-village of Alaska, at the head of the Lynn Canal, on the peninsula separating Chikot and Chikot Inlets. It has a cannery stores, and a few other buildings.

Chikot Inlet, the W branch of the terminal portion of the Lynn Canal Alaska, running NW from about lat. 59° 10' N (and receiving at the head the Chikot River) through which the Chikot Pass (lat. 60° N 3100 feet altitude) and the Dalton Trail to the Klondike region are reached. It is the territory for some time disputed between the United States and Canada.

Chikot or Taya (Dyea) Inlet, Alaska, the E branch of the head of the Lynn Canal, running N from about lat. 59° 10' N. At the upper end are the towns of Skagway and Dyea. It receives the Skagway and Taya rivers. North of it are the White and Chikot passes, through which the Yukon and the Klondike region are reached. By some geographers only the upper portion of the Chikot Inlet is designated Taya Inlet.

Chikot Pass, in the Kootenai or Coast Mountains of southeastern Alaska (in the territory for some time disputed between the United States and Canada), has an altitude of 5500 feet. It is on the route to the Klondike region and across the ridge separating the headwaters of the Yukon (Lewes) River from the tributaries of the Lynn Canal. It is widely desolate in its upper parts and markedly abrupt along its southern face. It was the scene of great hardship and struggle in the early period of the Klondike excitement but its function has virtually ceased since the completion of the railroad across the neighboring White Pass. An aerial telegraph road was built over the pass in 1898.

Chimbo, a mining town of Coquimbo, Chile. Pop. 1200.

Chimbarongo, a town (and river) of Chile, in the province of Colchagua. Pop. 2400.

Chimbo, cheem bó, a town of Ecuador in a valley of the same name, and on the Chimbo River in the Andes at the foot of Chimborazo mountain, and 86 miles NE of Guayaquil, with which it is connected by rail.

Chimborazo, shim-bo-rá-s (Sp. pron. cheem-bo-rá-tho) a famous mountain of Ecuador 90 miles E by W of Quito and 130 miles from the coast. Lat. 1° 29' S. Lon. 79° 5' W. It was long believed to be the highest summit of the Andes, but is now known to be surpassed by at least seven other peaks of Chile, the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, and Peru (Aconcagua, Boreas or Illimani, Illimani, Popocatepetl, etc.). The height, as determined by Whimper in 1848, is 20,498 feet above sea-level, but above the valley of Quito it only rises 13,900 feet, a height not quite equal to that of Mount Blanc above the valley of Chamouni. This vast mountain an extinct crater-like volcano with summit-glaciers presents a magnificent spectacle when seen from the shores of the Pacific Ocean. It was ascended in 1802 by Humboldt and Bonpland to the height, estimated by them of 19,286 feet, in 1831 by Boussingault and Hall to the height of 19,695 feet, and in 1880 by Whimper to the top.

Chimborazo, an Andean province of Ecuador southward of the mountain of the same name. Area, 6544 sq. m. Pop. exclusive of the Indians, about 123,000. Capital, Rioshamba.

Chimbote, cheem bó'th, a seaport of Peru, department of Ancash, in about lat. 9° 10' S. the starting point of the railroad to Huancayo. It has a fine iron pier and a good roadstead in Ferrol Bay. The valley of Chimbote has many ancient ruins.

Chimapanistick, cheem pá-neep-steek', a river of Quebec falls into the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the N. side, about 20 miles SW of Beres Island Bay.

Chimkent, a town of Russian Turkistan. See TOSHT.

Chimney Island, an island in the river St. Lawrence, 5 miles below Prescott, Ontario.

Chimney Point, a post-station of Addison on Vt. on Lake Champlain 3 miles from Port Henry N. Y.

Chimney Brook, a post-village of Park co. Mont. Pop. about 275.

Chimneyrock, a post-township of Rutherford co. N. C., 20 miles S. of Old Fort station. Pop. in 1900, 1358.

China. See CHINESE EMPIRE.

China, a post-village of China township (town) Kennebunk co., Me., on a lake of the same name and on the Wisconsin and Quebec R. 18 miles NE of Augusta. The town has various manufactures. Pop. of the town in 1900 1280.

China, a town of Mexico, in the state of Nuevo León 60 miles E. by N of Monterrey.

Chinab, a river of British India. See CHANAB.

Chinbat, a post-hamlet of Humboldt co. Cal.

Chinagrovo, a post-village of Pike co. Ala. 18 miles N of Troy. Pop. 200.

Chinagrovo, a post-hamlet of Pike co. Minn., 12 miles E. of Holmesville.

Chinagrovo, a banking post-village of Rowan co., N. C. 10 miles by rail E of Salisbury. It has cotton and roller mills. Pop. in 1900 887.

Chinahill, a post-hamlet of Telfair co. Ga. 30 miles SW of Milledgeville.

Chinamaca, a town of Salvador department and 12 miles W by N of San Miguel.

Chinampo, Korea. See CHINAMPPO.

Chinandega, che-nán-dá-gá, a department in the W part of Nicaragua. It is bounded on the W and SW by the Pacific Ocean and partly on the N by the Gulf of Fonseca and is intersected by the Rio Negro and its tributaries. Capital Chinandega. At its western extremity is the destructive volcano Cosigüina. Pop. about 32,900.

Chinandega, a town of Nicaragua, capital of the department of Chinandega, 24 miles NW of León, with which it is connected by rail. Pop. about 11,000. It has a fair commerce and is also united to its port, Corinto, by railroad.

China Sea is that portion of the Pacific Ocean which extends between China and the island of Formosa on the N, the Philippine Islands on the E, Borneo on the S, and the Malay Peninsula and French Indo-China on the W. It forms the great gulfs of Siam and Tongking. Chief affluents are the Menam, Mekong, Song-koi (Red River), and Si-kang rivers. Chief ports, Canton, Hong Kong, Manila, Saigon, Bangkok and Singapore. Greatest depth, 14,250 feet.

China Spring, a post-village of McLennan co. Tex. Pop. about 200.

China Straits separate Papua, on the SE, from the outlying eastern islets.

Chincha, chin sha, or Chincha Baja, a small seaport town of Peru, department and 115 miles SSE of Lima. It is situated at the mouth of the Chincha River on which a short distance inland is Chincha Alta, a town with about 4000 inhabitants.

Chincha Islands, a group of three small islands in the Pacific Ocean off the coast of Peru about 14 miles from the shore. Lat. 18° 39' S. Lon. 76° 29' W. These islands so noted for their guano, have been worked out and no longer afford that commodity.

Chincheilla, chin-cheel'ya (anc. Salaia) a city of Spain, 9 miles SE of Albacete. It has an old castle and is surrounded by walls. Pop. in 1900 6860.

Chincheilla, chin-cheel'ya, a post-village of Laokawanna co. Pa. 5 miles by rail N of Scranton. Pop. about 300.

Chincheon, cheen-cheon, a town of Spain 25 miles SSE of Madrid. Pop. about 5000.

Chin-chow, chin-chá co, a city of China, province of Ho-nan, 80 miles SSE of Kai fung.

Chin-chow, or Shin-chow, a city of China, province of Hu-nan on the Yun-kang 110 miles WSW of Lake Tung tung hu.

Chincoorro, or El Chincoorro Al cheen ko a reef off the E coast of Yucatan 110 miles S of Corumal Island.

Chincoorro (chung ko-toog local pron. jung go-tig') Island, a banking post-station of Aconcagua co. Va. is on an island of its own name, which is in the Atlantic Ocean separated from the mainland by Chincoorro Sound. This island is famed for its oysters and for its breed of ponies. Pop. about 2500.

Chindari, a town of British India. See CHANDARI.

Chindie, a port of Portuguese East Africa, at the mouth of the Chinde River one of the estuarine branches of the Zambezi.

Chindwara, chind-wá-rá, written also Sindwara (native, Chindwara), a town of British India, capital of a district, 65 miles N of Nagpur. It is a summer resort for Europeans. Pop. about 10,000.

Chindwara, a district of the Central Provinces British India. It is a diversified, pleasant, and fertile region. Capital, Chindwara.

Chindwin, or Kyendwin, the principal tributary of the Irrawaddy. It rises in the Patheon Hills flows through Upper Burma in a southerly direction, and enters the Irrawaddy from the right, between Mandalay and Pagan after a course of about 600 miles, for much of which it is navigable in the wet season.

Chinendega, Nicaragua. See CHINANDEGA.

Chinese Camp, a post-village of Tuolumne co. Cal. about 50 miles E. by S of Stockton.

Chinese Empire, a vast dominion of central and eastern Asia, comprising China proper, Mongolia (with its westward extension, Eastern or Chinese Turkistan), Manchuria, and Tibet, and extending from the Pacific to the Pacific Ocean, across nearly 60 degrees of longitude, and from the island of Hainan in the S (the southern limit of China proper) is about lat. 18° N to the Amur (in a region virtually under Russian domination) in approximately lat. 53° 50' N. The area covered by this vast territory is estimated to be 4,300,000 sq. m. containing a population of perhaps 350,000,000. Korea, over which China exercised the rights of suzerainty until 1905 is now under control of Japan while Formosa as a result of the disastrous war with Japan in 1894-95 has become a part of the Mikado's empire. The dominant physiographic features of the Chinese Empire are its lofty mountains (Himalayas, Kuen lun, Tian-shan, Altai), elevated plateaus (Tibet), the great Gobi or Shamo Desert, lowland coastal plains of China proper and mighty rivers (Yang-tse-kiang, Hoang ho, etc.). It contains the head-streams of the Brahmaputra, Indus, Ganges, Yenisei, Irtysh, and Amur and the deep depression of Lukchuan near the Bogdo-Ola Mountains, nearly 480 feet below sea-level. See the articles under these various heads, and for a fuller reference to the general physiographic features of climate, etc. MANCHURIA, MONGOLIA, TIBET, etc.

CHINA PROPER. (known to the ancient Greeks and Romans as the land of the Seres, whence Seres and Serica, and of the Sinae to the Arabs, from ancient times, as Sina, perhaps the original of the classical Sina; to the Europeans, in the latter part of the Middle Ages, from the time of Marco Polo, and later, as Cathay, a name derived from the race called Khitan, or Ki-tan, which held sway in China some centuries before the age of Marco Polo; to the Europeans and generally to the inhabitants of central and northern Asia as Kitai, ka-i the original of the name Cathay; Chinese Chung Kuo, the Middle Kingdom, or Chung Hua Kuo, the "Middle Flowery Kingdom") constitutes the SE. portion of the Chinese Empire, occupying a third of its whole extent, and lying on the eastern slope of the table-lands of Central Asia. It covers an area of about 1,500,000 sq. m. and is inhabited by more than 300 millions of people (one-fifth of the total population of the globe), who live under the same government, are ruled by the same laws, speak dialects of the same language, and possess a greater homogeneity and a more enduring national existence than any other people of ancient or modern times. It is included between lat. 18° and 43° N. (which includes the island of Hainan) and lon. 95° and 124° E. Its coastline is estimated to exceed 2500 miles, and the land-frontier 4400 miles. Its due north and south extent is about 1550 miles. China proper is divided into 18 provinces, as follows:

NORTH CHINA	MIDDLE CHINA	SOUTH CHINA
Kan-su	Kiang-su	Che-kiang
Shan-si	Ngan-hwei	Fo-kien
Shan-shi	Ho-nan	Kiang-si
Chi-li	Hu-pe	Hi-nan
Shan-tung	Soo-chuen	Kwang-tung
		Kwang-si
		Yun-nan
		Kwai-chow

Physical Features.—The land boundaries of China are Indo-China on the SW. the lofty plateaus or mountain-tracts of Tibet on the W. Mongolia on the N., and Manchuria on the NE. The contact of these countries, excepting in the case of Manchuria, is ruggedly abrupt, the land falling off towards China, especially in the W. and N. in steep escarpments or closely expressed and lofty mountain-ridges, a condition that has all but closed off China from the land side of the rest of Asia. Approach to it from the west is virtually permitted only by the neck between the Kuen-shan mountains and the Great Wall, on what is known as the Lan-chow route, and through the narrow defile of the upper Hoang-ho; and the passes leading from Mongolia, not excepting the Peking-Kalgan route, are hardly more accessible. Even in the main mountain-tracts of the heart of China the rugged contour of the surface is such as hardly to permit of mountain-passages, and access to the different provinces is obtained mainly or exclusively by the river-channels or animal-paths.

In its broader physiographic aspect, China may be divided into three well-marked divisions, 1, that of the great plain which stretches from the north of Peking southward to the Bay of Hang-chow or beyond, and extends inland from the coast to a distance of 300-400 miles; 2, the region of lofty mountains, which occupies perhaps a full half of the entire country and constitutes its whole western section; 3, the hill-country indefinitely delimited in the S. and SE. A fourth (disjointed) region, composed of the elevated flat lands, basins or valleys that are held up between bounding mountain-ranges, such as the S. and W. valley of the Wei (tributary of the Hoang-ho) one of the most distinctive features of China, the parallel trending valley of the Han; and the fertile red basin of Yun-nan—may with propriety also be recognized. These valleys and basins occupy elevations of from 3000 to 7000 feet or more. The great plain above referred to is so low and uniformly graded that it is subject to frequent and disastrous inundations from the rivers that traverse it. The Hoang-ho, China's Sorrow, whose course has been altered about a dozen times in the period of 25 centuries, is responsible for incalculable devastation.

The relations of the mountain-systems of China proper are not as yet fully understood, either as regards their position in the main Asiatic system or in their inter-connection. The two chains or systems that are most definitely outlined are the Tsin-ling (or Tsinling-shan) with its eastern continuation the Fung-shan in the north having a generally E-W trend and defining on the south the courses of the Wei and eastern Hoang-ho, and the still very imperfectly known and improperly named Nan-shan, with a WSW-ENE. course, in the south. The former which is largely constructed of schists and gneiss, and flanked by ancient Palaeozoic deposits, appears, topographically at least, to be a continuation of the Kuen-lun, or of the Mongolian range. These mountains, like the southern chain, give off numerous spurs and ramifications, which, with other mountains of less continuity or magnitude, help to divide the country into sectional areas of markedly severe relief. Their greatest elevation appears to be about 13,000 feet (Tapai-shan 10,000 ft.) In the extreme NW the Hohhot Mountains are seemingly the eastern continuation of the Altyn-Dagh. The mountains of Soo-chuen and Yan nan, among which are the loftiest summits of the land (in the Hang-shan 18,400 ft., Kinting-shan, 18,000 ft.), are disposed in numerous N-S parallel ridges, which are manifestly a southerly deflection of the Himalaya system. Much of the high and mountainous land of northern China is constructed of the fine powdery and in parts extremely fertile, material known as loess, the nature of which has been variously interpreted by geologists, but which is now generally assumed to be a wind-drift accumulation having its origin in the desert-tracts of the further north and north-west. This deposit has in places a thickness of several thousand feet and is carved into terrace-forms and deep and narrow gorges, with a resulting landscape of striking singularity.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers of China are comprised mainly in the systems of the Hoang-ho, in the north, the Yang-tse-kiang, in the centre, and the Si-kiang, in the south, the main streams having generally eastward courses. The Hoang-ho, which has a course estimated to be 2500 miles in length, is a shallow, circuitous, and almost unman-geable stream, difficult of navigation and of little commercial importance. It has fewer tributaries than almost any great river of the globe, and its displacements have at various times thrown the mouth of the stream alternately N and S of the Shan-tung peninsula. The Yang-tse-kiang is the main water way of China, and both in its navigability and length of course (estimated to be nearly 3500 miles) is a river of the first magnitude. Its banks are studded with cities, towns and villages, while its waters are crowded with craft in almost incredible numbers. (For detailed accounts of these rivers see HOANG-HO, YANG-TSE-KIANG, and SI-KIANG.) Other important rivers of China are the Min and Han, tributaries of the Yang-tse-kiang (the Wei, tributary of the Hoang-ho, the Pei-ho, or river of Tsin-ling, which drains the region of Peking, the Hun-ho, which joins the Pei-ho and the Liao-ho, on the NE. border. China has no lakes of very great size, the largest being Tsung-tung-hu (in the province of Hu-nan) with a length of about 60 miles, and Po-yang-hu (in Kiang-si)—both lying in the valley of the Yang-tse-kiang and connected with that river by means of short outlets; and the Tso-hu, Kao-yu-hu, and Hong-tse-hu, in the low drainage area between the mouths of the Hoang-ho and Yang-tse-kiang.

Climate.—In a country of such vast extent, extending from 18° to 43° N. lat. the climate must vary greatly. Indeed, as regards both climate and productions, China may be divided into three zones,—the northern, the central, and the southern. The northern zone extends to about the 33d parallel and includes the 5 provinces of Shan-tung, Chi-li, Shan-shi, Shan-si, and Kuo-shi. It produces the grains, fruits, and animals of northern Europe. Here the extremes of heat and cold are great. The winters are very severe, and at that season thick ice renders the rivers un-navigable. Among the productions of the northern provinces are maize, wheat, barley, oats, apples, the hase-nut, and the potato, they are also rich in wood and minerals. The central zone, the richest portion of China, embraces either in whole or in greater part the 8 provinces of Soo-chuen, Kwai-chow, Hu-nan, Hu-pe, Kiang-si, Ngan-hwei, Ho-nan, and Kiang-su, extending southward in its furthest point to about lat. 28° or 35°. Tea and silk are its characteristic products; the middle portion is the granary of China, and the eastern part is celebrated for its manufactures of silk and cotton. Cotton is grown even in Manchuria. The southern zone embraces the 5 provinces of Yun-nan, Kwang-si, Kwang-tung, Fo-kien, and Che-kiang. The exchange of its tropical productions for those of the northern zone is an important branch of the internal commerce of the country. Much of this third zone lies within the tropics, and its climate and productions are all tropical. Its fruits are oranges, lemons, mangoes, and bananas, rice is its staple grain, and the region produces the ground-nut, sweet potato, and yam. The mean annual temperature at Peking, which is situated on the 40th parallel of N. lat. (the parallel of Philadelphia) is 55.5° the mean for July or August is about 79° and for January 23.5°. The extremes of heat and cold are measured by about 99°. At Canton, in lat. 23° 15' N. the mean annual temperature is about 70° the mercury rising in summer to 95° and falling in winter to 58°-59°. The rainfall is fairly abundant throughout the greater part of the land, and well meets the requirements of agriculture. Dry winds prevail during limited seasons, more particularly in the N., and at times deluge the country with fine dust. During the wet-season rains the rivers rise prodigiously, giving differences of level between low and high water of nearly 50 feet.

Vegetable Productions.—These are very varied, and, as has already been seen, combine elements belonging to both the tropical and boreal regions the preponderating floral forms are, however, distinctly those of a subtropical or mild temperate zone, with numerous generic and specific types distinctive or characteristic of the region. The tea-plant is the most important vegetable production of China. The tallow-tree (Silindus sebifera) the Dryas cordata or varnish-tree, the camphor tree, Chinese pine, Chinese bayonet (Picea mitis) the funeral cypress, and the silk mulberry are among the most important trees of China. The cocconut and other palms flourish on the southern coast. Of the bamboo, which grows as far north as lat. 33°, there are numerous varieties and it has been said that the bamboos of China are more valuable than bar mines and, next to rice and silk, yield the greatest revenue. The main plant, from which grass-cloth is made, is an important product. Other plants, either indigenous or grown under cultivation are the ginseng, indigo, cinnamon, rhubarb, wax-tree, chrysanthemum and large water lily (nubium). The fruits of both the tropical and temperate zones—apple, grape, pomegranate, mango, peach, orange, lichee, lychee, etc.—are found in the country and the camellia, azalea, and gardenia are natives of the Flowery Land. Agriculture is held in higher estimation in China than perhaps in any other country in the world and the opening labor day of the year is officially solemnized throughout the land. The agricultural system of the Chinese is rude but effective. Spade-husbandry and irrigation are carried on to a great extent. In the northern provinces the cereals are principally maize, barley and wheat but in the south rice is raised in vast quantities and forms the staple food of the people. Tobacco, sugar, and the poppy are also raised. In the northern or loess region where the soil is of extreme fertility and where great expanses of flat country are found, cultivation is carried to a height of 8000 feet and more but in the south the cultivated areas are mainly restricted to the low lying plains and valleys and the artificially constructed basal terraces of the mountains. The chief tea-growing districts lie S. of the Yang-tse-kiang.

Animals.—The fauna of China, while it partakes most broadly of the characteristics of the general Hurasian, Holarctic, or temperate type, has in it a strong infusion of tropical or subtropical elements. The monkeys are represented by several species forms, while the tiger is still found in the less-frequented western region (Yue-nan) and occasionally even in the tracts of general habitation. Most of the larger wild animals such as the elephant, tapir rhinoceros, etc., have long since been exterminated, or nearly so. Wild-cats are common in the forests of the south and bears and wolves are found in the hills. Of the ruminants there are the musk-deer and several other cervine species. The domestic stock animals, excepting the water buffalo, are in most parts rarely seen and the dairy industry is practically unknown. The gold and silver pheasant, the argus pheasant, and other gallinaceous birds hold a prominent place in the ornithology of China. Water fowl inhabit the lakes, rivers, and marshes. The larger reptiles are unknown, but tortoises and turtles abound on the coast and lizards are plentiful to the south. The fish-fauna of China is one of the richest in the world. Sharks, rays, sturgeons, and other cartilaginous fishes are common on the coast and the carp formerly was very plentiful in the lakes and rivers. Loosens often commit extensive ravages. Silk-worms are highly valued and reared in vast numbers.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral wealth of China is very great, but until recently mining was conducted under very primitive methods and yielded consequently only a small product. The difficulty of access to many of the most productive mineral regions still continues as a bar to profitable mining development. Coal, iron, copper, lead, tin, mercury, and some gold (Yun-nan placers) besides salt (which is obtained from many brine springs) and China clay (and potter's earth)—the basis of the east-Asiatic industry of porcelain or china-ware manufacture—are the main mineral resources of the land. The productive coal measures are very extensive and constitute the largest continuous coal-fields of the world. The chief development of the Carboniferous coal-beds, both bituminous and anthracitic, is found in the province of Shan-si, but the coal territory extends through several provinces from Chi-li to Sze-chuen. Much good coal of post-Carboniferous and Tertiary age (lignite) is also found Kwen-chow is one of the richest of the mineral-bearing provinces. Of the non-metallic minerals special mention must be made of the highly prized jade or yu-stone, which has been found in Yun-nan, although most of the stone has been brought to the country by way of the NW pass, the Yu-men or Jade Gate.

Inhabitants.—Ethnologically, the Chinese belong to the Mongolian race. A tawny or parchment-colored skin coarse and lank black hair, a thin beard, oblique eyes, high cheek-bones, and small hands and feet are characteristic of the race. The average height of the Chinaman is about equal to that of the European; the women are disproportionately small, and have a broad upper face, low nose, and linear eyes. Of the general character of the Chinese it is not easy to form a fair and impartial judgment. By some writers they are said to be wanting in true religious feeling and belief and to be governed in their actions by a grounded materialism. The people generally have no fear of death, commit suicide as the solution of a difficulty and endure the most cruel tortures with a passive fortitude. They are as a race fond of peace and domestic order, industrious, practical, polite, appreciative of learning, and deeply imbued with the mercantile spirit. Chinese merchants are noted for their faithful observance of contracts. The language of the Chinese belongs to the monosyllabic class. In the mountainous districts of some southern provinces, principally Kwei-chow and Kwang-si are the people called Miao-lan, who are thought to be descended from the aboriginal inhabitants of China. In the SW part of the country (provinces of Sze-chuen) is another so-called aboriginal people, the Lolo. Other non-Chinese people inhabiting the country are the Manchus, who although providing the reigning family constitute but a small part of the population the Tibetans in the west (Sze-chuen) and the Shans in the region adjoining Indo-China (Burma, Siam).

The worship of ancestors is a remarkable and prominent feature in Chinese social life and is dictated by that principle of filial piety which forms the basis of Chinese society. Marriage is universal and within the reach of all, but there is a strict separation of the sexes in social life. Women hold a very inferior position and are little better than slaves. Polygamy is not recognized by law but secondary wives are common. Infanticide, though regarded as a crime, is practiced to some extent. The Lo-King or Book of Rites regulates Chinese manners and is one cause of their unchangeableness for here they are stereotyped and handed down from age to age. Of the numerous Chinese festivals perhaps the most remarkable is that celebrated at the commencement of the new year the first day of the year being the initial period or moment from which ages are dated. The festival of the dragon-boats is held on the fifth day of the fifth month and at the first full moon of the year the feast of lanterns. The Tartar tenure and braided queue become general with the Manchu conquest of the country. All the Chinese girls of the better classes suffer forcible compression of the feet in early infancy.

Manufactures.—The principal manufactures of the Chinese are silks, cottons, huns, paper and pottery. The finest porcelain is made in the province of Kiang-si. Their rich silks and satins, light gossams, beautiful embroidery elaborate carving on wood, shell ivory and stone, delicate filigree-work in gold and silver, fine lacquered-ware and cabinet-work antique vessels in bronze, and their brilliant coloring on pith paper command universal admiration. Machinery still remains an almost unknown aid to the Chinese in their manufactures. The discovery of the magnetic needle is generally attributed to the Chinese, who, however, made no application of their knowledge to the purposes of navigation. Similarly their early familiarity with the construction and properties of gunpowder was not associated with the manufacture of fire-arms, but with that of fireworks, which still constitutes an important industry of the land. The Chinese practiced the art of printing centuries before it was originated in Europe, and they had paper long before the Europeans. During recent years, as a result of closer contact with the civilized world and feeling the necessity of superior aid in possible struggles with other nations, China has shown a marked awakening. Ship-building and the construction of munitions of war are now carried on at several points (Fu-chow, Shanghai, Nanking, Tien-tsin, etc.) and large iron works have been established in the interior in association with ore-mining.

Government.—In the government of China the emperor is absolute in the empire, the governor in the province, the magistrate in the district. The emperor claims a hereditary divine right, and is not always the eldest son of the preceding monarch the eldest son or other near relative may be nominated, but his right to the throne as the Tien-Tai son of heaven," can only be established by good government, in accordance with the principles laid down in the national sacred books. The emperor is absolute as legislator and administrator, but he must legislate in accordance with the general principles acknowledged in the country. He also constitutes in his own person the highest criminal court. The Chinese possess a carefully digested code of laws, which is added to and modified from time to time by imperial edicts. Their penal code dates back about 3000 years. Death, which the Chinaman prefers to long confinement, is the penalty for a large number of offences. The emperor is assisted in governing by a cabinet (Nei-ko) of ministers of state, consisting of four members, two of Manchu and two of Chinese origin, besides two associates from the Great College, whose province it is to guard the laws within the limits prescribed by the sacred books of Confucius and the code of the empire. There are seven administrative departments in the government, subordinated to the main council or cabinet: those of civil appointments, revenues, rites and ceremonies, military affairs, public works, criminal jurisdiction and naval affairs (admiralty). Above the central administration is the Court of General Inspection, or the Censorate, consisting of from 40 to 50 members, and presided over by two chiefs, one of Manchu and the other of Chinese origin. The mandarins composing this see that all officers of the government, provincial or metropolitan, are faithful in the discharge of their respective duties. The Foreign Office instituted in 1861 under the title of Tsungli Yamen, was superseded in 1891 by a new Foreign Office called Wai-su-pu. In each of the provinces is a governor who, besides being at the head of the civil jurisdiction, is commander-in-chief and possesses the power of life and death for certain offences. The governmental organization of each province is complete in itself, the division being virtually autonomous. In the case of most of the provinces, groups of two or three of them are placed under a viceroy or governor-general. The official corporate unit is the hsien or city district. A group of these city districts is, under a city of the first class (departmental or prefectural city) designated as fu. The normal government of China is less a despotism than a morally supported autocracy and is in principle paternal. In ordinary times the Chinaman enjoys much personal freedom and can travel through the country or follow any calling he likes. The Chinese executive system is based on competitive examinations, which are intended to sift out from the millions of educated Chinese the best and ablest for the public service.

Education is eagerly sought by all classes. Literary proficiency commands every where respect and consideration and primary instruction penetrates to the remotest villages. Self-supporting day-schools are universal throughout the country and the office of teacher is followed by a great number of the literati. Government provides state examinations, but until recent years has done little to assist in the education of the people. In the Tung-Wen-Kuei or College of Foreign Knowledge, at Peking the more prominent foreign languages are taught, and there are also chairs of science and mathematics, many of which are held by foreign professors.

Army and Navy.—In theory the army consists of about 900,000 men, scattered throughout the empire besides 350,000 Mongol and mercenary troops assumed to be placed at the disposal of the government. The total number of men available for war service is about 869,699 of which the Tien-tsin army contingent, numbering 100,000 is almost alone conspicuous through its modernized methods. The whole force is composed of the Yang-Ping or National Army (with 18 army corps, one for each province) and the Eight Banners, the members of which are descendants of the Manchu conquerors. On the coast there are forts built on the most approved plans and mounted with rifled guns of steel. A large part of the army still remains a mere constabulary force. The imperial fighting navy is insignificant, and consists of a few armored and minor cruisers and a limited number of torpedo-boats and destroyers.

Religion.—Three forms of belief—the Confucian, the Buddhist, and the Taoist—may be considered the national religions, as they are believed in more or less by the great mass of the people. Of these, the Confucian and the Taoist are indigenous, but Buddhism was introduced from India. A struggle for ascendancy was long maintained between these religions, but has now entirely ceased, indeed it is no unusual thing for all three to be professed by the same person, and, as they supplement one another this is not altogether inconsistent. Confucianism the contemplation and observance of the teachings of Confucius, who lived about 500 B.C. is the basis of the social life and political system of the Chinese. It has been professed by all their greatest men, and is still the sole belief of the educated classes. It is, however, less a religion than a philosophy,— an ethical and political creed,—and does not pretend to treat of spiritual things. To live in conformity with the moral teachings of the great sage in family and social relations and in what pertains to the duties of citizenship is the professed aim of the Confucianist. Funeral temples are erected to Confucius, and, though his image is not used as an idol, his tablet is worshipped, and sacrifices of oxen and sheep are offered before it at the equinoxes. Buddhism was introduced into China soon after the beginning of the Christian era, several centuries after its birth in India. Though extending over the whole country and influencing more or less the mass of the people, it is fast losing its hold on them, and has very little of the power and authority it once possessed. Its edifices are going to decay and no new ones rise upon their ruins. Its priests are illiterate and together with their religion, are held in contempt by the philosophic Chinaman. Taoism has not more hold than Buddhism on the literate Chinese. Its priests are generally ignorant men, few of them understanding the real principles of their faith which has little connection with the teachings of its reputed founder Lee-tse, a contemporary of Confucius. They practise a mystic alchemy, propitiate spells and incantations, and, like modern spiritualists, hold intercourse with the dead. These mystic worship certain stars, which are supposed to influence human life, and also gnomes, devils, and inferior spirits.

Besides these three religions, which alone affect the bulk of the people, there is a ritual state worship—a kind of philosophic pantheism, an adoration of certain natural objects but it is a more ceremonial and associated with no theological doctrines. At the winter solstice the emperor offers sacrifices at the altar of Heaven in Peking. Chinese philosophy is atheistical, and deduces the development of the universe from one unalloyed and will-less principle. Hence all educated Chinese are theoretically atheists. Veneration for the dead with the Chinese finds expression in ancestral worship.

While Confucianism is to be regarded as the state church, there is no hierarchical establishment maintained by the Chinese government. The government is tolerant of religious diversity except where a political design is suspected. Missions are maintained in China by Christians of many sects and with considerable success in some places but the popular prejudice against Christianity is strong. The Catholic church counts upward of 1,000,000 adherents in China, and there are in the country perhaps 100,000 Evangelical Christians. The Mohammedan number probably falls 20,000,000 who are mainly distributed over the N.E. and S.W. provinces. There are a few Chinese Jews.

Commerce.—The foreign trade of China has assumed great importance. Raw and manufactured silk and tea are the great staple products for export. Raw cotton, beans and beanskins, skins, and hides are also sent abroad in large quantities. Wood, wax, fans, paper, fire-crackers, musk, rhubarb, sugar, opium, grass-cloth, and ornamental goods are likewise exported. The foreign imports are mainly cotton goods, kerosene oil, metals, metal wares, etc. The commercial intercourse of China is mainly with Great Britain and her colonies. Among other countries the United States, Germany, Japan and Russia take successive rank. There are about 50 ports open to foreign commerce—the so-called Treaty Ports—some of which are river-ports situated in the interior of the country. The following are the principal ones (excluding Manchuria): Shanghai, Canton, Kowloon (near Hong Kong), Tien-tsin, Swatow, Amoy, Cebu, Lappa, Fuchow, Hankow, Ning-tse, Kiangchow, Nan-king, Hangchow, Wuchow, Chungking, Ningpo, Kiao-chow, Chungking, Pakhoi, Wen-chow, San-shui, So-chow. The bulk of the trade with the British Empire passes through Hong Kong (near the entrance to the Canton River) which has been a British possession since 1842. China herself has a very large internal and coastwise trade, which is partly carried on by river and coasting steamers, many of them owned by Chinese and built in China. In those sections of the interior where there are no water ways the transport service is conducted by the backs of men and animals, and the ordinary travelling conveyance is the palanquin. The Grand or Imperial Canal, connecting Hangchow with Tien-tsin, over a length of some 700 miles, was constructed in the early part of the seventh century, and served for a long time as an important artery of communication but its usefulness has been somewhat impaired as a result of the irregularities of the Hoang-ho. There are several thousand miles of railway in operation nearly all opened within the last five years, and the work of construction is proceeding rapidly. The building is done by foreign companies. The aggregate length of the telegraph lines is about 15,000 miles.

Great Wall.—Of the numerous constructions—temples, pagodas, bridges, canals, etc.—for which China is famous ness is so remarkable as the Great Wall which extends along the northern frontier of the country and measures approximately 1300 miles in length. It is properly the most gigantic fortification of the world, and appears in places in double and triple courses. Its general height is about 20 feet, with a width at the base of 25 feet, narrowing to the top. Great square towers mark intervals of its course. It is generally assumed that the fortification, as it now stands, does not represent the original structure, and may not date further back than the closing period of the Middle Ages. Earth enclosed in brickwork forms the mass of the wall, but for half of its length it is hardly more than a heap of gravel and rubbish. It has been gradually falling into decay.

Cities—The number of large cities in China is very great, but the population given for most of them is hardly more than approximate or represents only a rough estimation. Among the largest are Peking, Hankow Canton, Si ngan Chang-chow Tien tsin Hang-chow Ku-chow Shanghai Sing tau Su-chow, Chung king Nanking Ning po, Ching-kiang and Amoy. Peking, the capital, has a population variously estimated at from 600 000 to 1 600 000 or more.

European Possessions in China—England holds Hong Kong, Wu-hai-wai, the latter on the coast of the Shan tung peninsula. Portugal, Macao, on the coast of Kwang tung. Germany, Kiaochow, on the coast of Shan-tung. France, a district about the bay of Kwang-chow, on the coast of the peninsula of Lau-shew Kwang tung. Manchuria is in great part occupied by Russia.

History—The historical period of Chinese history may be said to begin with the latter part of the third millennium B.C. although a great infusion of the fabulous still enters into the annals of the succeeding centuries. The Chinese records speak of three sovereigns Yao, Shun and Xu, who at this time are said to have founded social and political order and to have introduced an advanced husbandry among the people. In the period from about 2500 to 250 B.C. three dynasties successively held sway—the Hsia, Shang and Chow dynasties. Under the first two the Chinese dominions were confined to what is now northern China, but under the Chow dynasty they were extended over the Yangtze basin. This period of two millenniums is known as that of the feudal state. China at this time having been parcelled out among numerous petty chiefs. About 600 B.C. flourished the great philosopher and moralist Kung fu-tse (Confucius) whose teachings so powerfully affected the intellectual and political life of the Chinese people. About two centuries later lived Meng-tse (Mencius) whose ethical and economic dicta left an equal impression upon the nation. About 250 B.C. a ruler of the dynasty of Tsin brought the various parts of the country under his absolute sway and inaugurated the imperial state. This first emperor undertook the construction of the Great Wall as a protection against the Tartars. Under the dynasty of Han which succeeded that of Tsin about 200 B.C. and ruled for about four and a half centuries, the Chinese Empire reached its greatest extension, and was as flourishing within as it was powerful without. Soon after the beginning of the Christian era Buddhism began to make progress in China. In the Middle Ages there were endless divisions and reunions of the empire, varied by incursions and partial invasions by the Tartars and Manchus. In the tenth century the Tartar Khatan (Khitai) established their sway in the N. but about the beginning of the twelfth century they succumbed to the Han or Manchu people. In 1215 the Mongol leader of Genghis Khan captured Yenking (Peking) and in 1260 Kublai Khan, the grandson of Genghis Khan completed the conquest of China. The Mongols ruled over the country till 1368, when they were expelled by the Chinese and the Ming native dynasty succeeded. The Manchus established themselves in Peking in 1644, and finally after a seven years' struggle, acquired the sovereignty of the whole empire. Many of the conquering race now filled the highest offices of state. More than one powerful emperor of the race has ably conducted the government, and the Manchu dynasty still remains in power.

In early times the Chinese do not appear to have been opposed to intercourse with foreigners but the conduct of the Spanish and Portuguese between 1520 and 1570 excited their hostility. The Manchu government restricted foreign trade and intercourse to Canton where they were carried on through the medium of the Hong merchants. In 1840 a war broke out between China and England, which is known as the Opium War the exciting cause having been the effort on the part of the English to compel the Chinese to allow the importation of opium the production of which article was a source of great wealth to India. The British brought this war to a successful close in 1842, and by the treaty of Nanking the ports of Canton Amoy, Fuchow, Ning-po, and Shanghai were thrown open to British commerce and Hong Kong was ceded to England. With 5 free ports (since increased to about 40) foreign trade with China soon assumed great proportions. The empire was forced to emerge from its state of isolation with regard to the rest of the world. In 1844 treaties were concluded with the United States and France. In 1856 a second war broke out with England. The English were joined by the French and in 1857 the allies bombarded and occupied Canton, and in the following year captured the ports at the mouth of the Pei ho, which brought the ruse to terms. China conceded treaties at Tien-tsin with Great Britain, France, Russia (to which power she ceded the Amur Territory) and the United States. Fresh difficulties between the Chinese government and Great Britain and France led to an Anglo-French invasion in 1860 and the occupation of Peking by the allies. One of the most remarkable events in recent Chinese history is the Tai-ping (Tai-ping) Rebellion 1850-64. The leader of a society of God-worshippers persuaded himself and his followers that he had received a divine commission to uproot idolatry, extirpate the Tartar intruders, and establish the new nat. a dynasty of Tai ping or Universal Peace. This rebellion, which was at first successful, was finally suppressed in 1864 by the imperial forces, assisted by contingents of English and French troops. The invasion of Tongking by the French involved them in a war with China, 1884-85. In 1894 China became engaged in a disastrous war with Japan growing out of their relations to Korea. By the peace of Shimonoseki in 1895, China recognized the independence of Korea and ceded the island of Formosa and the peninsula of Liao-tung to Japan. The threats of the European powers however compelled Japan to forego Liao-tung. This war was followed by various depredations by the European powers upon Chinese territory. Germany obtained possession of Kiaochow (Kiaochow), Russia, of Port Arthur. England, of Wei-hai-wei, while France was given a foothold on the peninsula of I-tse-chow. The year 1900 witnessed the culmination of the Boxer movement, aimed at the restoration of former conditions and war upon the foreigners. The siege of the foreign legations in Peking brought on an invasion by the forces of the European powers, Japan and the United States, and the occupation of Peking by the foreigners. China was forced to a humiliating peace. Russia took advantage of these troubles to occupy Manchuria. In 1902 England and Japan entered into a treaty for the preservation of the integrity of China. In 1904 Manchuria became the principal theatre of a bloody war between Russia and Japan.

Cincinnati, cin-min'-na, the metropolis of the state of Ohio and the county seat of Hamilton co., is on the right or N. bank of the Ohio River opposite the mouth of the Licking, 476 miles by water below Pittsburgh, Pa. and 1529 miles above New Orleans, La. It is the terminus or intersection of several great trunk lines of railway and is 305 miles SE. of Chicago, Ill. and 563 miles due W. of Washington. Lat. of the Cincinnati Observatory at Mount Lookout, 38° 8' 19" N. lon. 84° 25' 21" W.

Cincinnati the tenth city in population of the United States, is situated in a valley about 3 miles in diameter surrounded on the N. side by a semicircular range of hills rising 400-500 feet above the river while around the southern margin the Ohio River sweeps in a grand curve. The greater part of the city is built on two terraces or plateaus, the first 60 and the second 112 feet above low water mark and occupies a position 430-550 feet above sea-level. It is connected by several bridges with Covington, Newport and Ludlow, on the Kentucky side of the Ohio, the most noted of which is the suspension bridge erected in 1855 and reconstructed in 1897. It measures, inclusive of the approaches, 2720 feet in length and carries the roadway 103 feet above low water line. Three of the bridges are railroad bridges. The central and business portions of the city are compactly built and the streets are laid out with much regularity. The lower quarters, which are largely occupied by warehouses and manufacturing establishments, are frequently flooded at stages of high water. There is, below the Newport bridge, a fine public landing or levee about 1000 feet long, which, with its floating wharves and wharf boats and the busy commercial life, presents an animated and inspiring picture.

The city is well provided with street- (mainly electric)-railways which render the suburban villages readily accessible and offer pleasurable trips for citizens and visitors. Several isolated places ascend to the surrounding heights and make a rapid approach to Clifton Heights, Mount Auburn, Mount Adams, Fairview, etc. where are located the best residential quarters, and which present a charming alternation of hillside and undulating tracts. Beyond the Miami Canal, which connects the city with Lake Erie, is the district known as 'Over the Rhine,' which is mainly occupied by the extensive German contingent of the population.

Of the buildings of a more or less public character a few of the more notable are the Chamber of Commerce, a striking edifice, monumental in effect; the United States government building, 364 feet long and erected at a cost of nearly $5,000,000; the city hall, 332 by 263 feet, a structure of brown granite and red sandstone and costing about $1,500,000; the Springer Music Hall, Art Museum, St. Peter's cathedral, armory, Odd Fellows temple, public library (with 275,000 volumes), court-house, opera-house, etc. A feature of special attraction is the Tyler Davidson Fountain on Fountain Square, considered to be one of the finest pieces of monumental art executed in the United States. Among other features of special interest are the zoological gardens and the Rookwood Pottery on Mount Adams, famous for its faience-wares.

Cincinnati maintains many hospital and humanitarian institutions, a commodious insane asylum (Longview Asylum) workhouse, etc., within and about the city, also numerous medical, dental, law and commercial colleges of high grade, among the medical schools being the Ohio Medical College and the Miami Medical College. The University of Cincinnati (constructed from institutions whose foundations extend back to 1819 and reorganized in 1870), with which the Cincinnati Hospital is affiliated, has academic, medical, law, ethical and pathological, and dental departments, and was attended in 1900 by 1500 students. It has succeeded with it the Cincinnati Observatory. Other educational institutions are the Mount St. Vincent Academy, St. Xavier College, Lane Theological Seminary, Hebrew Union College, Art Academy of the Cincinnati Museum Association, College of Music, and the Ohio Mechanics Institute. The city is liberally provided with public parks, one of which the Burnet Woods, occupies about 170 acres, while the famous Eden Park, often styled the Garden of Eden, has an area of 916 acres. Spring Grove Cemetery is noted as one of the most beautiful and picturesque cemeteries in the country.

Cincinnati ranks high as a manufacturing city, the annual value of the output of its factories being about $150,000,000-200,000,000 and representing the labor of approximately 8000 factories. The more important products include clothing, iron-wares, machinery, engines, safes, wagons, boots and shoes, milled and distilled liquors, soap, paints, pottery furniture, etc. The city is largely engaged in the manufacture of hog and beef-products, and is one of the chief centres of the pork trade of the country. It is also an important horse-market and a leading exchange for grain and pig-iron. The city is most favorably situated as a central distributing point between the eastern seaboard and the West, and is the great gateway from the North to the South. Its river commerce is important in both passenger and freight traffic.

Cincinnati (named in honor of the Society of the Cincinnati) was first settled in 1788, but not until 1816 was there any manifestation of important growth. In that year steam navigation on the Ohio River was inaugurated, and the place thenceforward grew rapidly. It was incorporated as a town in 1822 and as a city in 1819. The population in 1820 was 6641, in 1830, 24,631, in 1840, 46,338, in 1850, 711,435, in 1860, 161,644, in 1870, 216,239, in 1880, 255,159, in 1890, 296,968, in 1900, 325,902. Cleveland, a part of entry the largest city of Ohio, and the county-seat of Cuyahoga co., is delightfully situated on the south shore of Lake Erie, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga River, which flows through the city affording a fine sheltered harbor to which has been added a commodious ship-channel and an outer harbor of refuge, which is protected by a huge breakwater 2 miles in length and half a mile out from shore. Cleveland is connected by the Ohio Canal with the Ohio River at Portsmouth, and, in addition to its superior water-avenues, it is the centre of an important system of railroads (the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Erie, etc.), branching out in all directions. It is 134 miles by rail NW of Pittsburgh, Pa., and 153 miles SW of Buffalo, N.Y. Lake steamers connect the city with Buffalo and Duluth and with all important lake ports. Lat. $41^{\circ} 30' 4''$ N; lon. $81^{\circ} 49' 4''$ W. Two viaducts of stone and iron—one 3711 feet in length, completed in 1878 at a cost of \$3,300,000 and having a draw 332 feet long and the other 2531 feet long, completed in 1893 at a cost of about \$1,000,000—extend across the gulf of Cuyahoga and are among the finest works of the kind in the country. The city, lying at an elevation of nearly 600 feet above the sea, is built in greater part upon a plain that rises 80–150 feet above the lake, and is divided by the Cuyahoga inlet into a smaller western section (West Cleveland) and the major (eastern) city. The broad and regular avenues, streets, and boulevards, with their massive business houses and villa-residences, surrounded by open lawns and gardens, and handsomely ornamented with shade-trees and shrubbery, give to it an imposing and most attractive aspect. It has not inaptly been termed the Forest City. The chief avenues of business are Superior Street and the western section of Euclid Avenue. The former expands into the public square or Monumental Park, containing a soldiers' monument and statue of General Moses Cleveland, the founder of the city. On the square is located the building of the post-office and custom-house, and near by is the massive city hall. Euclid Avenue, the most fashionable residence-street of the city is justly famous for its gardens and mansions, and ranks as one of the finest residence-streets in the country. The city has a number of fine parks (Wade, Gordon, Rockefeller) and the beautiful Lake View Cemetery containing the Garfield Memorial (erected in 1896). Among the city's institutions of learning are the Western Reserve University (Adelbert College, Cleveland Medical College, College for Women, etc.) the Case School of Applied Science, St. Ignace College, University School, Notre Dame Academy, etc. The city has a music hall, seating about 3000 people, and a public library containing 200,000 volumes. It enjoys a temperate climate, with a mean annual temperature of 50° and a rainfall of 37.6 inches.

The manufacturing and commercial interests of Cleveland are most extensive and varied, the former being mainly associated with the iron industry, the city being one of the foremost removing points for the ore of that metal. The product in 1900 from the iron and steel-works (about 150 in number) was valued at $34,775,000 from the foundries and machine-shops, at $13,500,000. The city is also very closely associated with the oil (petroleum) industry of the United States, and is one of its chief lumber marts. It is in addition one of the chief ship-building cities of the Union, the ship-yards constructing vessels (mainly steamers) of 1600–2600 tons burden. Among the manufactures may be mentioned those of sewing-machines, clothing, agricultural implements, boilers, engines, electric machines and appliances, etc. Slaughtering and meat-packing are also among the major industries of the city. The total value of the manufactured product of Cleveland was in 1900 $139,850,500. The city has a very extensive lake commerce.

Among its many tributaries are the Douglas Water and the Avon which join it in the middle part of its course. Its scenery is extremely picturesque.

Near Lanark is a succession of rapids and beautiful cataracts, the famous Falls of the Clyde. The Firth of Clyde expands into a noble bay about 30 miles long and in its widest part near 50 miles across, in which are the islands of Arran, Bute, Great Cumbrae, and Little Cumbrae. From the Firth of Clyde the inlet Loch Lomond and Loch Fyne proceed northward. The length of the Clyde from its source to Dumbarton is about 100 miles. The work of making the river navigable for large vessels between Dumbarton and Glasgow belongs to the great achievements of hydraulic engineering. The Clyde is the greatest seat of ship-building in the world. Near the head of the estuary is the wharf of Greenock; on the island of Bute, the watering-place of Rothesay and on the eastern shore of the Firth the town of Ayr. The tide ascends as far as Glasgow. A canal connects the Clyde at Glasgow with the Forth. The basin of the Clyde, or Clydesdale, is famed for its orchard, coal and iron-mines, and its horses.

Cochin China, a name formerly borne by a province of the old kingdom of Annam, extending along its S coast to the S of Tonking. The designation was frequently applied to the whole kingdom of Annam. See COCHIN CHINA, Fauxra.

Cochin China, French, or Lower Cochin China (Fr. Rasse Cochin-Chine bis k'o'chin-chen) or simply Cochin China, a French possession in the SE. corner of Asia, included in the general government of French Indo-China. It is bounded on the N by Cambodia and Annam on the SE. by the South China Sea, and on the W by the Gulf of Siam. It projects southward as a peninsula, terminating in Cape Camao (or Cambodia) in lat. 8° 25' N. The northern limit is about lat. 11° 40' Area, about 23,000 sq. m. Off the SE. coast is the island of Omdor (Pulo Condor). Lower Cochin China is in the main a broad, low-lying alluvial plain, and includes the extensive delta of the Mekong. A great part of the coast-region is a swampy tract, and some covered marsh-lands stretch far into the interior. Towards the NE. the land rises, and near the extreme N the mountains reach an elevation of nearly 3000 feet. In the regions removed from the coast there are tropical forests of considerable extent, which abound in the wild beasts characteristic of India. The deposits of the Mekong and other rivers have produced a soil of exuberant fertility. There is a rainy season, corresponding to the summer of more northerly regions, the average annual rainfall being about twice that of the eastern United States. The climate is unhealthy for Europeans. The soil yields beautiful crops of rice, which is the chief food of the people and is exported in great quantities. The sugar-cane grows luxuriantly and appears to be indigenous. Cotton and tobacco are extensively raised and the culture of coffee is steadily advancing. Among other products are beans, maize, peanuts, coconuts, pepper, cardamoms, indigo, mulberries, araka-nuts and bananas. Among domestic animals the buffalo occupies the first place. The population of Cochin China in 1901 was 968,160. About nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Annamese. There are about 300,000 Cambodians and between 75,000 and 100,000 Chinese. There is a sprinkling of Moïs, Malays, Europeans and others. Buddhism is the prevailing religion. The Roman Catholics number about 75,000. The French have established several hundred schools, which are conducted mainly by native teachers. The exports of Cochin China include rice, dried fish, pepper, buffalo-hides, cardamoms, copra, cotton, ivorine, and silk. The bulk of the trade, which is mainly in the hands of the Chinese, passes through Saigon. Cochin China is administered by a Lieutenant-governor and Saigon is the seat of government. Other considerable places are Cholon, Bien Hoa, Mi-the (My the) Vinh-long, Long xuyun, Bao-lieu, Cham-doo, Ben-tra, Soc-trang, and Tay-ninh. The various portions of Lower Cochin China have come under French dominion at successive times since 1862.

Colmar, or Kolmar (L. Colmarium Colmaria) a city of Germany capital of Upper Alsace, on the Lunz, near its confluence with the Ill, 41 miles SW of Strasbourg. The old town has narrow crooked streets, but a handsome modern quarter has sprung into existence. Among the interesting buildings are the medieval church of St. Martin with the famous Madonna of the Bovehedge by Schongauer a native of Colmar the former Dominican Convent of Unterlinden containing the municipal library of 80,000 volumes, together with the Schongauer Museum, the oldest Dominican church the government building (the former palace of the prefecture) and the fine edifice of the Superior Court for Alsace-Lorraine. Colmar has spinning mills and manufactures of textiles, thread, starch, food-stuff, machinery, etc. It is an important railway junction. The suburb of Bogenbach has large cotton-mills. Colmar was a free imperial city of the old German Empire. It was annexed to France by Louis XIV and became part of Germany again in 1871. It was the capital of the French department of Haut-Rhin. Pop. in 1900 38,794.

Colnaghi, kol'ni-yah', a town of Italy 19 miles SE of Verona. Pop. about 2800; of the commune, in 1901 8319.

Cologne, ko-lon' (Fr. pron. ko lon Ger. Köln or Köln, köln and Op'iden (or Oel'ide) Ubi'um later, Cola'ria Agripp'ia and Cola'ria Ubi'um Agripp'ia) a city of Prussia, in the Rhine Province capital of the administrative district of Cologne, on the W bank of the Rhine, 45 miles NNW of Coblenz, and at an elevation of 120 feet above the sea. It is at the junction of several railways, and is opposite to Dents, to which two bridges extend. Its great cathedral, begun in 1248 and completed in 1880 one of the finest Gothic buildings in the world is the chief object of interest. It measures 148 yards in length and in height (the western towers) 512 feet. The city is a fortress of the first class and is the seat of a large trade. Besides the eau de Cologne, which takes its name from the place, it manufactures a great variety of articles, sugar, tobacco, glass, furniture, pianos, machines, chemicals, etc. Cologne was a town of some importance even before the Roman conquest, and many of its buildings are of great historical interest. The narrow and crooked streets of the old city and their quaint and irregular architecture give it more of the mediæval character than most German cities possess. A new city has been built up around these ancient quarters since 1881, and the modern Ring-Strasse, 3 1/2 miles long is a magnificent series of boulevards. Among the structures and edifices of general interest are the Rathaus, the municipal museum, the court of justice, post-office, imperial bank the monument to Frederick William III (erected in 1878) the church of St. Gertraud etc. Cologne possesses a municipal library of 180,000 volumes, rich in manuscripts, a splendid zoological garden, and several museums. Pop. in 1880, 144,772, in 1890 282,837, in 1900 372,239. The archbishops of Cologne ranked among the great princes of the old German Empire and held the position of imperial electors. The see was secularized in the course of the Napoleonic wars, and the Congress of Vienna assigned the old electoral territory to Prussia. In 1824 the dignity of archbishop of Cologne was revived. In the latter part of the Middle Ages the burghers of Cologne succeeded after bloody struggles, in emancipating themselves from the rule of the archbishops, who established their residence at Bonn. The town became one of the most important members of the Hanseatic League and one of the most populous cities of Europe. After centuries of decline Cologne again rose to great importance in the nineteenth century.

Cologne, ko-lon', a small town of France, in Gers, 18 miles N of Lombers.

Cologno, ko-lon' a post-village of Carver co., Minn. on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. 9 miles W of Cheaska. Pop. in 1900 235.

Cologno, ko-lon' yo, a town of Italy in Lombardy, 6 miles SSE. of Bergamo. Pop. about 2500.

Coloma, a post-village of Cherokee co., Ala., about 19 miles SE of Center.

Coloma, a post-village of El Dorado co., Cal. on the South Fork of the American River about 44 miles ENE. of Sacramento. Gold has been found here.

Coloma, a post-village of Parke co., Ind. 4 miles W of Rockville. Pop. about 200.

Coloma, a banking post-village of Berrien co., Mich., on the Pawpaw River and on the Pere Marquette R., 8 miles NE. of Benton Harbor. Pop. in 1900, 687.

Coloma, a post-village of Carroll co., Mo., 15 miles N of Carrollton. Pop. 135.

Coloma, a post-village of Deerledge co., Mont. Pop. 75.

Coloma, a post-hamlet of Washburn co., Wis. 50 miles W of Oshkosh. Pop. 75.

Coloma Station, a post-village of Washburn co., Wis. on the Wisconsin Central R. 35 miles E. of Stevens Point. Pop. 250.

Colombes, kol'lonb', a town of France, department of Seine, 8 miles by rail NW of Paris. It has petroleum refineries, manufactures of starch, gelatin, woolsens, etc. Pop. in 1901, 22,697.

Colombia, a federal republic of South America occupying the northwesternmost portion of that continent, and bounded on the N by the Caribbean Sea, on the E. by Venezuela, S. and SE. by Ecuador, by disputed territory claimed to extend to Peru (lon 70°-15° W) and by Brazil, and W by the Pacific Ocean and the republic of Panama.

Its most northerly point is Punta Gallinas, of the Guajira peninsula, about lat. 12° 30' N. southward the country in the fullest extent, extends to the valley of the Amazon, to lat. 4° 30' S. The isthmian extension of Panama, shutting westward upon Costa Rica, and until 1903 extending the boundaries of the main-land through nearly 7 degrees of longitude, or upward of 600 miles, constitutes almost wholly the new republic of Panama. Colombia is divided into eight departments, which, with their capitals, are as follows:

Departments.	Capitals.	Departments.	Capitals.
Antioquia	Medellin.	Cundinamarca.	Bogotá.
Bolívar	Cartagena.	Santander	Santa Marta.
Bogotá	Fajal.	Sucumbamanga.	Bogotá.
Cañon.	Popeya.	Tolima	Bogotá.

The population estimated for 1895 was about 4,000,000, which included about 150,000 wild Indians.

Relief of the Land.—Colombia may be properly divided into two main physiographic regions,—that of lowlands (savannas, llanos, deltas or forested tracts) in the E. and S.E. and that of mountains and plateaus in the centre and W. Three main mountain-chains traverse the republic from S. to N. and are a part of, or are linked to, the great Andean system: the western range, or Cordillera de Occidente, which rises in the Cerro Tuma to upward of 15,000 feet elevation, the central range, or Cordillera de Quindía —so named from the famous Quindía Pass, which crosses its central portion—which is a direct continuation of the Eastern Cordillera of Ecuador and like it is composed largely of ancient schists and granite rocks, and the eastern range, or Cordillera de Bogotá or Summa Pae, which seems to stand in the same relation to the main Andes that the Jura Mountains do to the Alps. It is largely constructed of comparatively new (Cretaceous etc.) sediments and is entirely free of volcanoes. Near the Cocl-Pampion bifurcation, where is situated the Cocl Peak its highest elevation (about 18,000 feet) it sends off one branch eastward into Venezuela (to unite with the Sierra de Mérida) and another the Sierra de Perija, to continue as the backbone of the Guajira peninsula. The central range is studded with volcanoes, active or semi-active and extinct, and carries the highest summit of the land (Tolima, in partial eruption as late as 1829 18,400 ft. Harvo, 18,300 ft. Huila, 18,000 ft. Santa Isabel 16,760 ft. Ruiz, 17,400 ft.) This chain flattens out northward into the plains of Antioquia, Bolívar and Magdalena, but seems to have a direct constructive continuation in the magnificent isolated mass of the Santa Marta, which abuts abruptly upon the Caribbean Sea, and rises to an altitude of nearly or quite 18,000 ft. The three Colombian mountain-systems converge near the Ecuadorian frontier in the knot of Pasto. It would appear that the low mountain axis of the isthmian extension, which was depressed beneath the sea in Middle Tertiary times, bears only a secondary relation to the true Andes, which properly terminate on the eastern side of the Atrato depression. See PANAMA.

Rivers.—The main streams of Colombia are the Magdalena, whose course is largely directed between the eastern and central mountain-ranges the Cauca, its main tributary flowing between the central and western ranges, the Atrato, pursuing a nearly parallel course, but one lying west of the Andes proper, and which defines a depression extending almost continuously from the Gulf of Darien or Urubá, on the Atlantic side, to Chirambira on the Pacific; the Meta, Guaviare, and Vichada, tributaries of the Orinoco, and the Negro (Ucayali) and Japurá (Caguatá) important affluents of the Amazon. There are no streams of any magnitude discharging into the Pacific Ocean. The Magdalena is geographically and commercially the most important river of the republic, and is usually ranked, in length and volume of water, as the fourth river of the continent, being surpassed only by the Amazon, Orinoco, and Paraná. It has a course, including its windings, of over 1000 miles, and is navigable, except for a single break of 30 miles,—the rapids of Honda, 600 miles above its mouth,—for nearly 800 miles. (See MAGDALENA, CAUCA, ATRATO, etc.) There are no large lakes in the republic, but a great lacustrine sea appears at one time to have occupied much of the plains of Cundinamarca.

The climate of Colombia varies with the elevation. The coast-land and low plains are in general hot and frequently malarial, but the high table-lands have often a genial climate, the perpetual spring of Bogotá being especially fine. Here every product of the temperate zones grows to perfection. The mean annual temperature is about 85° with 48-49 inches of rainfall. In the deep river-valleys and on the slopes, means of 80° or more is maintained, and the temperature not rarely rises to 105°. The rainfall over parts of the Atlantic-Pacific lowlands is very high, as much in some places as 150-200 inches.

Resources.—The mineral wealth of Colombia is great. Considerable gold is produced, largely from placar deposits, although much vein- and reef ore has lately been obtained. Rich ores of silver are known to be abundant, and a few of these are exploited to some degree. Numerous quantities of fine quality are found in the state of Boyacá. Salt and coal are plentiful, and platinum, copper, mercury and several other metals are found at different points. The annual output of gold and silver is about $4,500,000 in value. The salt-mines of Zipaquirá, near Bogotá supply nearly the whole country with salt. Petroleum is found in several of the departments. Among the native vegetable products are many fine timber trees, the wax-palm, cocco, India-rubber, bamboo, ipéca, calisaya bark, divi-divi, balsam of tolu, vegetable ivory, cochineal, acajapilla, logwood, furú, arachis, etc. These, with rice, mother-of-pearl, cotton, indigo, tobacco, coffee, sugar bananas, lilies, gold-dust, orcs, don-skins, and Panama hats, are leading articles of export,—the last commodity being extensively prepared from the fibre called jipijapa, the product of a native palm like tree, the Caricodora.

Wheat, maize, and barley thrive in the temperate high-land. Only a small section of the country is under cultivation. A black, almost unexploitable and unshakable sea, known as that of the pedregos follows the limits of arboreal vegetation on the mountains from a height of about 10,000 to 15,000 feet. In the deep forest tracts the vegetation is extremely luxuriant. Among the native animals are the puma, jaguar, bear, deer, armadillo, ant-eater, sloth, omy opossum, tapir, many kinds of monkeys, the condor, parrots, humming-birds, etc. The manatee is found in the Atrato and Magdalena rivers.

Several lines of railway are planned to connect the principal cities, the aggregate length in operation being in 1901, 411 miles, with others in course of construction. The foreign trade is now chiefly carried on at Barranquilla, Sabana, Rio Hacha, Cartagena, Santa Marta, Buenaventura, and Tumaco. Numerous steamboats are employed upon the Magdalena, and some development has been made of steam-navigation on the Amazon tributaries.

The government consists of a president, elected for six years, a senate of 24 members (8 from each department), and a house of representatives (1 for each 50,000 inhabitants) elected by universal suffrage. The governors of the departments are nominated by the president. The Spanish language is universal except among the Indians. Compulsory education is required by law. The principal towns are Bogotá (the capital, with about 120,000 inhabitants), Medellín (50,000), Cartagena, Buenaventura, Ibagué and Popeya.

In the colonial period Colombia was a part of the Spanish viceroyalty of New Granada, in which Venezuela was also for a time included. The movement for the liberation of the country from the yoke of Spain was inaugurated in 1810. While the struggle was in progress Bolívar founded, in 1819, a republic of Colombia, which embraced New Granada and Venezuela. In 1821 he triumphed over the Spaniards, and soon after the province of Quito (Ecuador) was freed from Spanish rule and engaged. The union was dissolved in 1830-30 and thenceforth there were three separate republics. The country under consideration was called New Granada (and later the Granadine Confederation) from 1881 to 1881, then the United States of Colombia until 1886, when a new constitution was adopted and the official name of the state changed to La República de Colombia. In 1903 the department of Panama, having a population of about 355,000 seceded from the republic. The present population consists in principal part of mestizos, and includes about 360,000 pure whites, 500,000 negroes and mulattoes, and 150,000 unacculturated Indians.

Colombier, in the S.W., a village of Switzerland, Canton of Valais, 4 miles S.W. of Neuchâtel.

Colombo, or Ceylon, the principal export town and the modern capital of Ceylon on its W. coast, in lat. 6° 55' N., lon. 79° 40' E. It consists of the European city and of the native quarter between which is a citadel built by the Dutch. The harbor originally very poor, has been much improved by a great breakwater. Colombo has a very extensive trade, and is a leading place for many English and other lines of steamers. Railway lines proceed hence into the interior of the island. The town is artificially supplied with water brought from a distance of 30 miles. The inhabitants comprise, in addition to the Singhalese, a number of Parsees, Jews, Tamils, and Malays, and a mixed population of Portuguese, Dutch and English descent. Colombo is the seat of an Anglican and of a Catholic bishop. It has a museum and a branch of the Asiatic Society. The Portuguese established themselves here in 1817, and in 1868 were discovered by the Dutch who were ousted by the English in 1798. Pop. in 1901, 158,983.

Colón, a banking post-village of St. Joseph co. Mich., on the St. Joseph River and on the Michigan Central R., 4 miles E of Centerville. It has various manufacturing industries and is a shipping point for agricultural produce. Pop. about 800.

Colón, a post-village of Saunders co., Neb. 8 miles by rail N of Wahoo. Pop. in 1900 193.

Colón, a town of Cuba, province of Matanzas, 40 miles by rail SE of Cardenas. Pop. in 1899 7175. It is in a sugar region.

Colón, formerly Aspinwall, a seaport of the republics of Panama, on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus of Panama, 47 miles by rail from Panama (and forming one of the termini of the railroad, opened in 1855). It has a capacious harbor and is in regular steamship communication with the chief Atlantic ports of the world. It acquired considerable importance at the time work was in progress on the Panama Canal. Pop. about 4500.

Colón, a town of the Argentine Republic in the province of Entre Ríos, and on the Uruguay River which is here navigable for large craft.

Colón, a department in the NE part of Honduras. The Caribbean Sea and the Saguera River form the N and E boundaries, and the Cuzco River the W. The western part is mountainous and the eastern has fertile plains well adapted to agriculture and stock raising. Capital, Trujillo. Pop. in 1887 11,474.

Colón, a territory of Venezuela, comprising the islands Orchila, Los Roques and Araya in the Caribbean Sea. Pop. about 140.

Coloma, or Coloma Station, a post-village of Henry co. Ill. on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. and the Burlington Route, 13 miles E of Rock Island.

Colona di Bariante, ko-lo'ne-á, a village of Italy in Tuscany, 8 miles NE of Castiglione della Pescaia, remarkable for the remains of cyclopean walls and for Roman and Etruscan antiquities.

Colonges, ko-lonsh, a village of Vaud, Switzerland, on Lake Geneva, forming part of greater Montreux.

Colonia, ko-lo'ne-á, a department in the SW part of Uruguay along the lower Uruguay River and the Río de la Plata. Area, 2192 sq. m. The soil is fertile and well watered. Capital, Colonia. Pop. in 1900 50,275.

Colonia, a maritime town of Uruguay on the N bank of the estuary of the Plata, opposite Buenos Aires, 98 miles WNW of Montevideo. Pop. about 3000.

Colonia, or Colonia Agrippina. See Colours.

Colonia Juarez, a colony of Mexico, in the state of Chihuahua and district of El Paso.

Colonia Beach, a post-town and summer-resort of Westmoreland co. Va. 70 miles S of Washington D C. Pop. in 1900 453.

Colonna Patricius, an ancient name of Comova. Colonna (ko-lon-ná) a cape (It. columna and Columna Promontorium) the most southern point of Attica, Greece. Lat 37° 38' 32" N, lon 24° 1' 45" E. Its summit is crowned by the ruins of a temple, 280 feet above the sea, of which a number of columns are still standing, whence the name of the cape.

Colonne (kolon-ná) a Cape (anc. Columna Promontorium) a headland of Calabria, Italy, projecting into the Ionian Sea, 6 miles SE of Cotrone.

Col'oney, an island of the Hebrides, in Argyllshire, Scotland, 9 miles WNW of Islay. Area, about 16 sq. m. Close to it is the little island of Oransay.

Colony, a banking post-city of Anderson co. Kan. 10 miles by rail S. by W. of Garnett. Pop. in 1900 483.

Colony, a post-village of Knox co. Mo., on the Middle River, 35 miles WSW of Keokuk, Iowa.

Colony, a post-hamlet of Washita co. Okla., about 14 miles S of Weatherford.

Colony, a post-village of Fayette co. Tex., about 6 miles from Flatonia.

Colophon (Gr. Kalaphon), an ancient Ionian city on the coast of Asia Minor, NW of Ephesus.

Colo'ra, a post-village of Cecil co., Md. on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore R. 63 miles WSW of Philadelphia. Pop. 250.

Colorado, ko-lo-rá-do, a west-central state of the American Union, traversed by the Rocky Mountains. It is bounded N by Wyoming and Nebraska, E by Nebraska and Kansas, S by Oklahoma and New Mexico, and W by Utah. The 37th and 41st parallels of N latitude and the meridians of the 103d and 109th degrees of W longitude enclose the state. Area, 103,925 (land-surface, 108,643) sq. m. In the order of its admission to the Union it is the thirty-eighth state.

Surface of the Country.—Colorado is broadly divided into two clearly-defined physiographic areas: the plains in the E and the mountains in the W. The latter as the main mass of the Rocky Mountains, traversing the state in several more or less distinct ranges from south to north. The more important of these ranges are the Front Range, in the east, and, following westward the Park and Sangre de Cristo ranges; and, as almost direct continuations, the Medicine Bow Mountains in the N and the Culebra and Sangre de Cristo mountains in the S. Other mountain elevations are the Uncompaghe and San Juan mountains in the SW and the Elk and White River mountains in the W. Among the loftiest summits of the state are Pike's Peak (14,108 feet) and Long's Peak (14,271 ft.), two of the most famous mountains of the Front Range; Gray's Peak 14,341 ft. Mount Lincoln, in the Park Range, 14,297 ft., Mount of the Holy Cross, 14,006 ft. Mount Harvard, 14,375 ft., Mount Princeton, 14,196 ft. Mount Yale, 14,187 ft. and Uncompaghe Peak, 14,323 ft. Blanca Peak, in the Sangre de Cristo Mountains, 14,390 or 14,465 ft. is the loftiest summit in the state, and, with the possible exception of Mount Whitney of the Sierra Nevada of California, and the volcanic cones of Rainier and Shasta, the most elevated mountain of the United States outside of Alaska. The isolated Spanish Peaks in the S are volcanic and rise to 13,620 ft. Elevated passes, some of the loftiest of which are traversed by railroads, unite the inner basins and give access to the interior. Such are the Hagerman Pass (11,536 ft.) on the Continental Divide, near Leadville the most elevated railroad pass across the Rocky Mountains the Marshall Pass, 10,868 ft. and the Veta Pass 9300 ft. A cog railroad ascends to the summit of Pike's Peak.

Owing to the deficiency of precipitation in the state, the mountains carry a very high snow line, and many of the loftiest summits such as Pike's Peak are almost entirely free of snow during the summer. Hence, there are hardly any ice-fields that are worthy of the name of glacier (Hallett Glacier). Few of the peaks have a strictly Alpine character.

The mountain-chains enclose a series of remarkable valleys known as parks often containing small lakes, which occupy the place of larger ones that gave the lacustrine or basin-like character to the parks themselves. The parks are generally small, but some are larger than some entire states of the Union. The best known of the great parks are the North, Middle, South (between the Front and Park Ranges) Los Añinos and San Luis parks. Notwithstanding their great elevation most of the parks are fertile, well timbered and have a mild climate, and the remarkable height of their mountain-walls gives them a strikingly clear asceticism and magnificence of scenery.

The extreme west of the state is largely in the form of lofty plateaus with steeply exposed escarpments and with horizontal or nearly horizontal strata extending over long distances. Parts of this vast uplift are seen in the Uncompaghe Plateau and the singularly variegated Book Cliff Plateau. The great plains that lie east of the mountains have plateau characteristics, since they rise to nearly 6000 feet where they abut against the great mountain-wall (as at Colorado Springs). Their fall is steady towards the Mississippi Valley. There can be no doubt that they represent the floor of an ancient (Cretaceous) sea, but the surface is largely masked by lacustrine deposits.

The principal rivers of Colorado are the South Platte, the upper forks of the Kansas, Arkansas, Rio Grande, White, Green, Gunnison, and Grand the last being the main head-water of the Colorado River. Many of these streams traverse the mountains in deep and narrow gorges (cañons) which contribute some of the most imposing features of scenery in the state. Such gorges are the Royal Gorge or Cañon of the Arkansas, incised through the Archaean granites to a depth of 2000-3000 feet, the Cañon of the Grand River and the Toltec Gorge, in the south. Other remarkable features of scenery in the state are the earth-pillars and monoliths and rock-spires that attest the erosion of the land-surface, beautifully exhibited in the Garden of the Gods near Manitou, in Monument Park and elsewhere.

Climate.—The rainfall is small as compared with that of most maritime regions being over most of the state less than 15 inches and rarely exceeding 30 inches. There is a noteworthy freedom from malarious diseases, and the whole region has a high reputation as a resort for consumptives. The great elevation of the state gives it a delightful summer climate. Little snow falls in winter even upon the mountains, and cattle feed upon the self-cured and naturalized grasses throughout the winter. The pure air the fine scenery and the clear skies of Colorado are prized by every tourist.

Agriculture.—Agriculture is not carried on to any great extent, except in places where irrigation can be effected. Thus treated, the lands yield generously all the ordinary straw grains and the root-crops of northern culture. In 1905 the total area under cultivation was estimated at only 2,045,000 acres. The production of wheat was 7,200,000 bushels, of corn, 3,190,000 bushels, oats, 3,370,000 bushels, and hay, 1,780,000 tons. Garden and dairy products are specialties at some points, and the orchard-fruits are in some parts brought to a degree of perfection that is hardly attained elsewhere. In general, cattle-grazing and sheep-husbandry are the leading pursuits kindred to agriculture. For these occupations no part of the Union seems better adapted. The vegetation of the plains is mainly that of herbs or low shrubs and grasses, displaying at times, and even at altitudes of 8000-9000 feet, a wonderful profusion of flowers (prairie vegetation). Box-elder, cottonwood, and a few other kinds of trees grow sparingly along the streams in the E. section; and a large amount of pine has been cut.

Mineral Resources.—The state is pre-eminently rich in minerals and presents many contrasts of extremely remunerative mining. Gold, silver, lead, copper and iron represent the metallic wealth of the state, which is also largely supplied with coal and petroleum. The best-known silver-lead mining centers are Leadville, Aspen, Silverton, Creede, and Telluride, while the most productive gold region is that of Cripple Creek, lying near the NW foot of Pike's Peak. The value of the mineral yield for the state was, in 1900, about $45,000,000. In 1903 the gold product was valued at $22,540,100 and the silver (commercially) at $7,014,768. The coal (and lignite) mined during the same year was 7,400,000 tons. Hot and mineral springs occur at numerous points, among the best known being those at or near Manitou, Buena Vista (Cottonwood Springs, etc.) Glenwood Springs, and Ouray.

The chief cities and towns are Denver the capital, with, in 1900, 133,860 inhabitants; Pueblo (28,187), Colorado Springs (21,685), Leadville (12,465), Cripple Creek (10,147), Boulder (6160), and Trinidad (5345).

The state has numerous institutions of advanced learning, the more important of which are the state university at Boulder, the University of Denver at University Park, the state school of mines at Golden, and Colorado College at Colorado Springs. A state normal school is located at Greeley and the Denver Normal and Preparatory School at Denver.

History and Government.—Cave dwellings and remains of Indian pueblos have been found in the southern part of the state. Two-thirds of Colorado, including the western half and a tract along the S. line, belonged to Mexico until 1845, and was regarded as a portion of New Mexico, and a portion of this tract has long supported a scanty Spanish-American population with a strong admixture of Indian blood. The discovery of gold in 1858 was followed by a rapid influx of settlers. In 1861 the territory was organized. In 1876 Colorado became a state of the Union. The governor is elected for a term of two years. Senators and representatives the aggregate number of which cannot exceed 100 are elected for four and two years respectively. Colorado is represented by 3 members in the National Congress.

Colorado Desert, a name frequently applied to the arid sections of southeastern California, bordering upon Arizona, the general surface of which is considerably depressed—in places 100 to 250 feet—below sea-level. It receives of times the surplus discharge (overflow) of the Colorado River, which is retained in temporary lake-beds (Salton Lake, etc.).

Colorado River, Tex., rises in the table-lands in the NW part of the state, by two branches, called the North Fork and Salt Fork, which unite near lat. 32° N. The river takes a generally SE. course and enters Matagorda Bay just SW of Matagorda. It is the largest river running through the state, except the Brazos, and is about 550 miles long. The principal towns on its banks are Austin, Bastrop, and La Grange. Steamboats can ascend it to Austin upward of 200 miles, except when the water is low and shallow, and draft-boats about 60 miles further.

Colorado River, sometimes called Colorado of the West, is formed by two head-streams, the Green and Grand rivers, which rise respectively in the Rocky Mountains of Wyoming and Colorado and unite in Utah near lat. 36° 18' N. and lon. 106° 45' W. The Colorado runs south-westward through the high, treeless, and arid table-land of Utah, whence it passes southward into Arizona and runs for 350 miles or more in a profound channel called the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, one of the most wonderful natural formations of the globe. (See GRAND CAÑON or GUN COLORADO.) Below this cañon the river runs southward, forming the boundary between Arizona on one side and Nevada and California on the other and enters the Gulf of California in Mexico. Its length exclusive of the branches, is estimated at upward of 1100 miles, and the area drained by it at 250,000 sq. m. Steamboats can ascend it about 500 miles from its mouth, or to the mouth of the Virgin River. The Colorado receives no large tributaries from the west; the more important ones from the east are the Gila, the Little Colorado or Colorado Chiquito and the San Juan. Many of its minor tributaries are included in deep cañons like the major stream. At its mouth the river has a breadth of about 1500 feet, with a depth of water varying according to the tides of from 7 to 33 feet. At high-water there is frequently a discharge into the depressed lands of south-eastern California.

Coltunage, to-loo-gwa'pa, or Colibud, a lake of the Argentine Republic, in the territory of Chubut, supposed to discharge its waters into the Bonaire.

Columbia, or Oregon, the largest river of North America, with the exception of the Yukon, that discharges into the Pacific Ocean, rises in the Upper Columbia Lake (close to the Kootenay River), British Columbia, on the W. slope of the Rocky Mountains, near lat. 60° 13' N. and lon. 115° 50' W. at an elevation of 7700 feet. It runs first northward and subsequently southward through the Arrow Lakes to the northern boundary of Washington, near which it receives a large affluent called Clark's Fork or River. From this point its course is very circuitous, and directed to the Oregon frontier, a few miles before reaching which it receives its largest affluent, the Snake (Shoshone or Lewis) River. Changing its flow westward, it forms the boundary between Oregon and Washington for about 350 miles and enters the Pacific Ocean at the NW extremity of Oregon through an estuary about 35 miles long and 2-7 miles wide. The tide ascends it about 160 miles to the Cascades, a series of rapids caused by the passage of the river through the Cascade Range. The length of the Columbia is estimated at 1400 miles. The Columbia is a rapid stream and traverses a mountainous region which is remarkable for grand and picturesque scenery. Basalt and other volcanic rocks underlie a large part of the valley of this river especially that part which is in Washington. The area drained by it is estimated to be about 360,000 sq. m. At the junction with the Snake it has a width of nearly 4000 feet, while at the Dalles it is contracted to less than 250 feet.

This river is divided into four main navigable sections. The first is from its mouth to the Cascades, a distance of 160 miles. As far up as Vancouver, at the mouth of the Willamette (a large affluent from the S.), it is a broad deep river navigable at all seasons by the largest vessels that cross the bar at its mouth. The second section of the Columbia is from the Cascades to the Dalles, a distance of 50 miles, where the obstruction of the Dalles of the Columbia is encountered. (See DALLES.) The third navigable section reaches from Celilo to Priest Rapids, about 185 miles, and the fourth extends from near Colville upward, about 250 miles, and is navigable by small steamboats. Passenger steamboats now make the traverse direct from the Dalles to the lower river. Among the tributaries that have not been mentioned are the Spokane on the E. and the Okanogan, Wenatchee, and Yakima on the W., all in Washington and further down the Deschutes, in Oregon.
